Of without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their trauailes, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound iudgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his iniurie, (such as it was) he produceth substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and censureth the vantage of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill co-hering:
which paines it is to be suspected, that he would not haue taken, had hee bene borne in either of these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and bene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall haue some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some Workes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent.
But since this cannot bee, wee must bee sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of things; and beleue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probability. This attentue circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulness, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaille of Cannæ. For it is said, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusium, chosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the consull Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neerettenne thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consull were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had bene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadors from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meete to send any, or without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a prettie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the

ouethrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuell dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman campe, and trusted vp the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Sardinia; finding a disposition in the Hirpinis, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cossa, where hee laid vp his baggage; and leauing his brother Mago to take in other places, He hastned into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their griuous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vs'd, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their loue by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all waies and means, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also hee began to deale kindly (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being provoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his Countrey; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule; not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to choose ten of their number, that should bee sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransom: and together with these, hee sent Carthago a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to seele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoop vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these arts prevailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, since the Roman Colonies, or the Latins, were not onely wearie of their losses past, but entertained deceeuable hope, of changing their olde Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Sammies, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits; but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuell affinities therewith as strictly conioyned, as were any since the Latins, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as somethen thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrey, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like layes by their feathery, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the Maiestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so prevailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calpurnius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginians, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourne into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the necernesse of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithfull meaning; were driven to sit still in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate, on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The people holding so tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Government of Magistrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppression; had now good cause to feare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more streight subiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being ready to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they late in Council, about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to ioyne themselves with Hannibal, who should countenance the fact, and save them harmlesse. This hee spake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himselfe by the People, and priuie vnto their designs. Hauing thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: Hee promised neuertheless to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freele put themselves into his hands, offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should stand for, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue; He called the people to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as hee knew they would be glad to heare, hee told them, that these wicked Gouernours were superseded by his policie, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessity required, That they should choose a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the olde. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Choose then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, vnprovided for such soon election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentured to name whom hee thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some known fault, basenesse, and insufficiency, or else euen because they were vknown, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing become named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time bee spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtlesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for sauing all their lines. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People, giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them down: All the City being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Canna, this impediment was remooued: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these prevailed so far, that Embassadors were sent vnto Tarentum the Consul; to see his present case; and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wheresoeuer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their State; and desired to know what he would command them: But the most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost; and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Sammies. Hereunto he is said to haue added a foolish Inuective against Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How hee had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, and to feed vpon man's flesh, with such other stuffe, as onely bewrailed his owne feare. As for the Campanians themselves,

He put them in minde of their present strength : they having thirty thousand foot , and foure thousand horse ; with monie , and all provisions , in abundance . Thus hee dismissed them , prouder then they came , and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship , whereas before , they were somewhat timorous , in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie . Having reported this at Capua : the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal , with whom they easily made alliance , vpon these conditions ; That the Campanians should be absolutely free , and ruled by their owne Lawes ; That no Citizens of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate , in what case soeuer , whether in War or Peace ; and , That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campanians three hundred Roman prisoners , such as themselves would choofe , whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily .

Against all this Negotiation , Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly : vying , in vaine , many perswasions , to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude , whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines , wishing them not to change olde friends for new acquaintance . This did hee , when they were sending Embassadors vnto Hannibal : and this also did hee , when the new Alliance was concluded ; but most earnestly , when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Towne : at which time hee gaue aduice , either to keepe it out , or to fall vpon it and cut it in pieces , that by such a notable piece of seruice , they might make amends vnto the Romans , whom they had forsaken .

Aduertisement hereof was given to Hannibal : who lying about Naples not farre off , sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe . This Magius refused : alleging , that he was , by the late concluded Articles , free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian ; and therefore would not come . Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua : forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples ; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado , but found the wals too high , & was not well provided to lay siege vnto it . At Capua he was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe : all the people issuing forth of the Towne , to behold that great Commander , which had wonne so many noble victories . Having taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie , and passed ouer his first Entertainments ; He came into their Senate : where he commended their resolution , in shaking off the Roman yoke ; promising , that ere long all Italy and Rome it selfe , should be driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe , and receive Law from thence . As for Decius Magius , who openlyooke part with the Romans their enemies ; He prayed them , that they would not thinke him a Campan , but a Traitor to the State : and vsd him accordingly , giuing sentence out of hand vpon him , as he deserued . This was granted : and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal ; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans , at his first coming , by putting to great a man to death , yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie , it he kept him alive , thought it best to send him away to Carthage . Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanians : among whom ; onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him ; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius . This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal , whilst he was at supper , the first night of his coming ; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt . All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie , that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans , vpon whom at the present they could lay hand ; or , (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath .

The same course of fortune , with those of Capua , ranne some other Townes therabouts , which depended on this , as their Mother-Citie . Nola , Nuceria , Naples , Casert , and Aversa , were the Cities next adioyning , that stood out for the Romans . Against these Hannibal went , thinking to finde them weakly manned ; as they were indeed , though stoutly defended .

The Romans at this time were not in case , to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes ; but were faine to leaue all places , except a few of the most suspected , vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants . Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals coming , at the first report of the overthrow at Cannae : and the griefe of that losse was so general , and immoderate , that it much disturbed the provision against apparent dangers . It was hard to iudge , whether the losse already received , or the feare of destruction presently threatening , were the more terrible . All the Senators found worke enough , to stint the noyse and lamentable bewailings , whereof the streets were full . Couriers were sent sent forth , to bring assured tidings how all went : whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them , they were so amazed , that they ranne into barbarous superstition ; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal bookes , buried a liue two men and women Gauls and Greekes , in their Oke-markers . If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions ; we may iustly thinke , that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Diuell . Yet is it not improbable , that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers ; whose detestable counsels they afterwards , for their own honors (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl . An Embassadour was sent to Delphi , to consult with the Oracle of Apollo ; and enquire with what prayers & supplications they might pacifie the gods , & obtain an end of these calamities . This is enough to discouer their great feare ; though not seruing to giue remedy . At that time came Letters out of Sicily , from the Prætor Octacilius ; whom the Senate had appointed , if hee found it meet , to passe ouer into Africa . In these were contained newes , of one Carthaginian Fleet , that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron his good friend and confederate ; and of another fleet , riding among the Isles Agæti , which was in readines to set vpon Lilybæum , and the rest of the Roman Prouince ; if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron .

In the midst of these extremities , it was thought needfull to call home Tarentina the Consul , that he might name a Dictator , to take soveraign charge of the Weale publique , with absolute power , as necessity required . It must needs seeme strange , that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul , and bid him welcome home , giuing him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique . But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate : which therein (doubtles) prouided wisely , for upholding the generall reputation . If his coming into the Citie had renewed the lamentations and our cries of the people : what else would haue followed , than a contempt of their wretchednes , among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion ? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome , and thanks ; they noyled abroad a fame , which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal , of their Magnanimity and Confidence : that might seeme grounded on their remaining strength . This therefore was wisely done . But whereas Lucius would haue vs thinke , that it was done generously , and out of great spirit ; let me be pardoned , if I beleecue him not . It was done fearefully , and to couer their griefe : had they dared to show their indignation , they would haue strucke off his head ; as in few yerres after , Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question , and was banished by them , being lesse blame-worthy , for a small-temperance . M. Junius , by appointment of the Senate , was nominated Dictator ; and T. Sempronius , Master of the horse . These fell presently to multering of Souldiers , of whom they raised foure new Legions , and a 1000. horse : though with much difficulty ; as being faine to take vp some , that were very Boyes . These foure Legions are elswhere forgotten , in accompt of the forces leuiued by this Dictator ; and two Legions onely set downe , that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the yere for custodie of the Citie . So it may be , that these two Legions being drawn into the field , foure new ones of Prætextati , or striplings , were left in their places . In such raw Souldiers , & so few , little confidence was to be reposed ; for which reason they increased their number , by adding vnto them 8000. sturdy slaves , that were put in hope of libertie , if they should deserue it by manfull seruice . This not sufficing , the Dictator proclaimed , That whosoever ought mony and could not pay it , or had committed any capital offence , should forthwith be discharged of his debt , or punishment , if he would serue in the war . To arme these Cōpanies , they were faine to take down , out of their Temples and Porches , the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set vp : among which , were 6000. Armors of the Gauls , that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius , a little before the beginning of this VV . To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans , as a due reward of their insolent oppressions , that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates , in the habit of strangers , when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans , armed Roman-like .

About the same time it was , that Carthalo , with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannae , came to Rome . Carthalo was not admitted into the City , but commanded , whilst he was on the way , to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory . To the messengers of the captiues , audience was given by the Senate . They made earnest Petition , to be transformed at the publique charge , not onely the teares & lamentation of their poore kinsfolke , but the great need , wherein the City then stood , of able Souldiers , commending

their fate; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custom of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former Warre) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy; much was alledged against these who now craved ranfome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ranfomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuiled to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had bene seuerer; when as indeed they were futable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggerly. Herof it is no little prooffe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ranfome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might haue bene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we withall consider, that these private men did onely lend the Romans a while vnto the Common wealth, and were afterwards contented so forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the War should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his Chapmen: but seeing he dealt onely for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like fault rittie, vpon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was vsed toward the souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euery) that which they call ragione di Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common wealth beinge driven to a miserable exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing iniuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or else were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre should be ended, how long soeuer it lasted, and that without reuward. The same thrifty censure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, saue only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cassius Metellus, and a few other hard-brained fooles his companions; who beinge fought out of their wittes, with the terror of so great a losse, were deuising, after the battaille, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuerthelesse it was quietly digested, the excuse beinge no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie, tooke the field with sixe and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: nor more of him than this. That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weak estate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofis with a Fleet, ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee so was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, hee sent these of his new Leuy to Rome, for defence of the Citie, and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: deliuering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrats, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were liketo be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginian, and knew not how to aroid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iourneys thitherward; and arrived euen time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven; whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of sustaining much inconuenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and such talke vied some, that had little feare of their own priuate want or pouerty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of speciall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good seruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vllage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberrall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks hee could vnto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiuing this, wrought vpon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserued of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly reputed for his personall valour, he made this Bantius to faire in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, wherof he had not presently aduertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence wherof they gaue him a preemporie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by composition; and to returne backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, beinge ouer-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bested, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but onely to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which he sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there passed messages betwene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, euen to find him busied within the Citie, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walles; hee thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three seuerall gates looking towards the enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walles were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals; and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherewith Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherewith like sort issued they of the new leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more auailable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the brauest Actes performed in all that Warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about threeſcore and ten of high Treason, whoſe heads he ſtruck off; and ſo leauing the Town in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went & encamped hard by about Sueſula. Hannibal in the meane ſeaſon was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wiſedome to loſe time in perſuaſions, but laide ſiege vnto it, and began on all ſides to cloſe it vp. This terrified the People, who knew themſelues vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finiſhed, and they quite ſurrounded, they ſtole out by night, and left him the Towne empty: which he ſacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Caſiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling that an Enemy ſo neere ſhould diſquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It ſeemes, or rather indeed it is plaine, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated to the ſpirit of the Carthaginian: who durſt with a ſmall part of his Army ſecke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman ſtrength. Wherefore the ioy of his Enemies, vpon ſo ſlight an occaſion as the death of ſome two thouſand of his men, at the moſt, and thoſe not ſlaine in plaine battaile, but by a ſudden eruption; wereleſſe chiefly, in what great feare they ſtood of Hannibal, and how Creſt-fallen they were: that hauing three yeeres ſince demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleaſure, by his owne Citizens; could now pleaſe themſelues, as with good newes, to heare, That in a ſkirmiſh not farre from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not reſiſtible. At Caſilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, and held it. Five hundred of the Prætor ſines there were, and about foure hundred of Peruſia, with ſome of the Latines. All theſe had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaille at Canna, being ſent by their ſeuerall States to the Campe: whether whileſt they were marching, the tidings of that great miſfortune encountered them, and ſent them backe ſorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whoſe gouernment they liued happily. So came they all, one after another to Caſiline, where they met and ſtayed. Neither had they ſtayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua. How that great Citie became the King-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Caſiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore ſought how to rid their hands of thoſe Prætor ſines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laide one for another, at laſt they ſlew all the Towneſmen in a night, and fortified the Weſterne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the River Vulturnus) againſt the Enemy. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that theſe of Caſiline were as the reſt of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themſelues might haue bene reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their conſtancy in defence of the place with ſtiff vpon what honeſt reaſons they ſurpriſed it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountered with greater forces: but theſe few found him more worke then hee expected. Diuers aſſaults hee gaue, but was ſtill repelled with loſſe: and many fallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: oppoſing ſo much induſtry to his force, that he was driuen to cloſe them vp, and ſeek to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Maſter of the horſe, lay with the Roman Army higher vp the River: who ſaine would haue relieved Caſiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about ſome matters of Religion, had giuen him expreſſe charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Sueſula could not come: his way being ſtopped by the ouerflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans alſo beſeeching him not to leaue them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water ſtayed his journey, ſuch entreaties were needleſſe. Neither is it like, that the Dictator carryed at Rome ſo long, as till extreme famine had conſumed the Garriſon in Caſiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was loſt, becauſe the Romans durſt not adventure to raiſe the ſiege. Barrels of corne were ſent by night, ſtoring down the River; and when ſome of theſe, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, ſtuck among the Willows on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was diſcouered and prevented; Gracchus caſt a great quantitie of Nuts into the ſtreame, which ſainly ſuſtained the poore beſieged men. At length when all fooode was ſpent, and whatſoever grew greene vnder the Wall was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the beſieged preſently ſowed Rape-ſeede. Hannibal ſeeing this, admired their patience; and ſaide, That he meant not to ſtay at Caſiline, vntill the Rape were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto he had reſuſed to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by puniſhing their obſtinacy; yet now he was content to grant them their liues at an indifferent ranſom, which when they had paid, he quietly diſmiſſed them according to his promiſe. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Caſiline, as a Garriſon for defence of the Campanes; vnto whom he reſtored it. To the Prætor ſines Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their preſent condition pleaſed them ſo well, that they choſe rather to continue, as they were, in Prætor ſine: which is no weake prooff, of the good eſtate wherein the Citie flouriſhed, that were ſubiect to the Roman Government. This ſiege of Caſiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and conſumed much of his time, that might otherwiſe haue bene better ſpent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, long before hee could diſpatch the buſineſſe: which how to quit with his honour hee knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where hee reſreſhed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Hiſtorians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as ſhall appeare hereafter.

Of the great ſupply that was decreed at Carthage to be ſent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and ſloth or perſimony of the Carthaginians, the ſupply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faſter, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Hiſtorians, how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the ſonne of Amilcar, had ſpent ſome time about the taking in of ſuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal ſent for him to Capua, and thence diſpatched him away to Carthage, with the ioyfull meſſage of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Conſuls he had chased, wounded, or ſlain; how the ſtout Romans, that in the former waire neuer ſhunned any occaſion of fight, were now growne ſo calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, becauſe he neuer durſt adventure to come to battaile; That, not without reaſon, their ſpirits were thus abated, ſince Hannibal had ſlaine of them about two hundred thouſand, and taken about fifty thouſand priſoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortune of thoſe great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among theſe hee magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not onely (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe ſeate of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to reſt that winter, attending their ſupply. As for the waire, Hee ſaid it was euen at an end, if they would now purſue it cloſely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themſelues, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to conſider, that the war was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that ſo many battailes had much diminiſhed his brothers Army: that the Souldiers, who had ſo well deſerued, ought to be conſidered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corne, and other neceſſaries; but that theſe things muſt be ſent from Carthage: which the victory would require with large amends. Finally hee cauſed the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were ſlaine, to be powdered out openly in the Court: which being meaſured, filled (as ſome ſay) three bultheads, or (as others would rather haue it) no more then one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatneſſe of the Roman calamity, ſo much as none but the principall of that Order, were accuſtomed to weare that ornament.

Who ſo conſiders the former Punicke Warre, may eaſily finde, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance thereof, any ſuch hopefull aduantiſements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marueile, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this ioy, Himilco, a Senator aduerſe to the faction of Hanno, is ſaid to haue demanded of that great perſwader vnto peace with Rome, Roman E-

Whether

* Thus Livie reports it, and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the bravery of private men was not altogether ſo great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwiſe (as Annali The King, was the general privilege of the

which the Romans might have bene found occupied, euen with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince, then must Emporia haue bene besieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in halfe: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians, hauing not about foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceeding well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not o-
 10 strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards; would haue bene a worke of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Cannæ: yea it had bene in effect none other, than to alter the face of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, nere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborne; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vnterly out of Spaine: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne homie to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwards remoued Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by 20 taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seate of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had bin somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were farre lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not only in gouernment of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike aboue their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony vsed toward their owne Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spaine.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or 40 for the most part, vpon success of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though wee must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his owne Countrey, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleeue those lies, which the vnpartiall iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntuth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves vnto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Amilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These words, being referred to the brauer resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberal. For in the treaty of peace betwene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise hee would not talke of any composition:
 Amilcar

Pol. lib. 1.

Amilcar boldly bad him chuse, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countrey had put into his hands to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome vpon late advantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who stoutly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sence thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betwene Fabius (as also perhaps betwene other 20 old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoeuer Liuie introduced Hanno, in one place, ioyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the hands of Agathis, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had a like euent; yet elsewhere he forbearth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, 30 concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liuie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before Aldrubal the sonne of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

It hath bin shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from 40 Gaul into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Romus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had been allotted vnto the Consul, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio beleeued, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulship; which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat maruellous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many batailles, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we haue cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find means to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrey from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily winne vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serue to arme the Naturals against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had reuolted vnto the Romans, were it onely by the memory of such ill success, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure: which easily raised Souldiers, amongst those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Warres; or seeing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if wee durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Liuie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Liuie in his person, maketh an obiection, vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him doth doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Asdrubal being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battaile, save only by the steepe descent of Rockes, over a great River that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly towards the Pyrennees, and so toward Italy; vpon which he fell with more then thre score thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if hee should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away be-10 fore him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so haue they said to haue done in the last battaile between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Campe. Wherefore we can no more then be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisdome to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporiae, an Hauentowne, not farre within the Pyrennees, retaining still the same name with little infection. That by the fame of his clemency, hee so allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vie his clemency, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a mere stranger, and hauing no insidiation in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better success, for that he seemed to haue none other end, than setting them at liberty. This pteit availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some hee compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when hee had wonne a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that hee remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgot, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Supplicants; Maislestem Pop. Rom. comiter consequent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, that they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Maislie of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure couenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ; of the Roman irrediction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily taken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguntians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore hee not onely appointed Hanno Gouvernour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Province betwene Iberus and the Pyrennees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke hee gaue the Principallty of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) Hee made him not onely Lieutenant generall ouer the main matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferior Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indifferently into the protection of others, that many times proue worse then the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanais, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by seeking to auoide it. This bad affliction of his Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore hee aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wonne

it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, rowing abroad in the Country; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, hee ranne vp into the Country, where he withdrew the Illegetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleet: where hauing set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illegetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Austani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembered, become Carthaginians on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subiect vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illegetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saved himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal backe to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginians returned into the heart of his Province, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio's coming, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Illegetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefite: helping the misdoers one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise vpon sense of injuries receiued, or apprehension of more grieuous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Country Lawes, and not vnder Gouvernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: even from hencefoorth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were neuer thoroughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight at Stea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too farre on ground, hee tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, aboue one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates, in Spaine, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, or giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flee into the utmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Luciania. Yet it follows; that the Illegetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Illegetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celiberians, that lately were become his subiects, and had giuen him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginians three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes; where hee slue fiftene thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then armed P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and hence forward the two brethren jointly administered the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did hand constant, without both feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Lin. lib. 21.

Asdrubal, Bolgar, the Governour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be persuaded by one Acidux a Spaniard, that the onely way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: persuading them, as hee had done Bolgar, to make the Liberality their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleue so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreate, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and five hundred horse, out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet; and provides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last yeere for their negligence, which had betrayed the Romans. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischief, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence hee dares not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laid vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrey round about. This good successe breeds negligence, for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disposes the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had beene informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spaine was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to employ they should find worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gauls; through whole Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he lays great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subiects: and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuer name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards hee haied into Italy. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Campe, the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are maruellously enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes euent ioynees all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrey stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to Rome; and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither money, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: so as vnlesse they may be supplied from

Rout,

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Cannae, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted else-where, into the relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearefully he mistrusted his owne safeties? They find him, and Atago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of threescore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably coniecture to haue stood, where Carinnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illyergetes their neere Neighbours, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed, but most of all, for want of victualles. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing victualled the place, encourage the towne-men to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon beholde them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about sixtene thousand against three score thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, driue all the three Carthaginian Commanders, euery one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, besides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that stood a litle Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrey, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in this iourney, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battell by Ibera. Howsoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them about thirteene thousand slaine, and about three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Liui gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste ouer the Riuer. At Castrum Altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victualles, being strong and defensible, as intending to make it his seate for a while. But the Countrey round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling also vpon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Publ. withdrewes himselfe vnto Mons victoriae: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouerlooketh the Southerne Outlet of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs vnto him; and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, with a full Army, arriues to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neere encamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himselfe to an high peece of ground; where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great city of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the Riuer Betis. Neuertheless the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to lecke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had bene so grievously beaten

the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breaks out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kills aboue twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fixe and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fuet thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great bataille fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelue thousand men; three to thousand prisoners taken, and seauen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auriges; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed cūen by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen alhamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralld vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrey once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faime (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for having so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore disperfed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrey of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue so disturbed them, if they had beene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourney; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Hauen town, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocæans, kinne to the Masilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue won a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those batailles lately remembered, after every one of which Asdrubal late downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leue and arriual of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wonne Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in praesenting onely with the Celiberians the next adioyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeeres business. Of these Celiberians we heare before, That they haue yielded vpon themselves vnto the Romans, for security of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue; vnlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Luine followes, to call euery messenger, or straggler, that entered their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deale with their Countrey-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men; that all his fellows at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue to desire to leade them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipios, presuming on this access of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; euen among the Celiberians, at Antorgu. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is five daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrey, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the olde Roman Army; leaving the third part, and all the Celiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer iourney to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They ioyne their forces together; meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches; wherein hee thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masaniassa, Prince of the Massageti, Nusidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremisen: to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed, for that hee becomes aduoynd Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is coming with seuen thousand and five hundred of the Susitanis, to ioyne with his Enemies. Feare therefore to be strait thut vp, and besieged, he illies forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leaving T. Fontem his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Nusidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue beene ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neyther are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vn certaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is strucke through with a lance, and slaine: yetty few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty daies after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrey. If Antorgu, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it, a Celiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may iustly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe; either to resist the Enemy, or to ioyne with his Brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard standing, where growes not so much as a shrubbe, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weakke defences the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue, that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adioyning, escape vnto T. Fontem, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Capitaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to adventure himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twenty yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seene of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Marius no better than dreames; & either very vnreconizable was the feare of all the Roman Capitaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that so not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insilt.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foote, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province: which he entertained with such a maiestic, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the 20 nemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleue this, then must we needes beleue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of yo young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yere) hee did nothing; but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the 30 first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue been well enough defended, if some iusher-men of Tarracon had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-land, betwene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the wals, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had founded; and finding some part thereof a lhelte, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thrust therinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. The falling suddenly vpon the backes of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and giue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Luine himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africa and Spain, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Provinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtlesie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefite. Hereupon a Prince of the Celiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neereft Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberny, forooke the Carthaginian party, and ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not want himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vie, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuoluing from their enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by iniuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honourable dealing of Scipio.

Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no vntrue token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Scipio; then could nothing haue beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howloever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some new places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won vnto himselfe the assured loue & assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet neuertheless they let a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surpris, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne coniecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth toward Italy; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, on late downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage ouer the Lake had been vndiscovered, and the Towne helde out some longer while. For howloever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the businesse, betwene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be withed, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spain should be taken from him. Wheras therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Towne, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprize: euen to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the 30 Spaniards; as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vancourers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore side; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betwene the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he defended, more vpon
40 brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, thin for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not faue him from the Romans. They climbed vp the Hill to him; they recouered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand
50 men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrenies, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needes must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shal appear at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumus the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans trying with the Aetolians, make warre upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WHE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, then sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd some walled towne, in like sort as he did Geryon, & the Castle of Canne: but had he spent much time about the getting of any one place well decidd; the hunger, that his Army must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may haue bene the reason, why he forbore to adventure vpon Rome, after his victory at Canne. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the Citie at his first coming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprize. Yea, many of the people that opened so haltilly their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, & waited perhaps the cue of another battaile: if being either for want of meane to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might come) from the wallles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to recieve a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the winter was passed over ioyfully, sauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I hide not: onely we finde, that after this he had about thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had bene lost in his iourney through the Marishes of Heurria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought th' Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourney; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauē, to recieve the Fleete that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Cassilum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Hauē-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To this same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Lucians, and Hanno to the Lucanis: not forgetting at once to asslay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needs be deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill iourney of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petelia or Petilia by force, after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Confinia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the Citie of Laetri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except onely the Towne of Rhegium, ouer against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good gouernment vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a private iurisdiction within themselves) fell downe to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willing to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safety, as hauing already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and hauing striuen in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Canne, they had shewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Armie of fife and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pinens they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if hee desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that hee should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Phariaris, their Subiect and Rebell, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little furable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Armie was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the Wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subiect; I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue bene done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumus his skull, being cleauid, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessel, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amaze ment was no lesse then the calamitie. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdileus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeres following, the Romans dealt vpon such termes, entreating their assistance against Philip and Persus; not commanding their dutie, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For

lousie of Philips greatnes: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Atolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being ioyned with the maine power of Atolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his trouble some neighbours desired peace of him, and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable conditions, as ill beleeued vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Townes, that had made to them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Eliu; which threatened Achaia, where Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactus, waited the Countrey in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them, coming vpon them in great haste from the Nemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Naue into Greece, to assist the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reasonas, to being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vie the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastning vpon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that hee should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, He was encountred by the Atolian and Roman garrison, which draue him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had received no great detriment, in his retreat from Eliu: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Countrey was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a lowe tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathred vpon by an Atolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale beleued.⁴⁰ All Macedon therefore was in an vpror: and not onely the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Countrey, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted, who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achaians. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom he meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-faouredly: especially in the Ile of Euboea, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue bene lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such haste marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Euboea, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilest he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philips arrivall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships; finding the Romans gone gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this misadventure; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without slaying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonis, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Atolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedemon; had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arrivall, was returned home.

The Lacedemonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Aegypt, went about to choose two new Kings, and to conforme themselves to their old manner of government. But their Estate was so farr out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proved no lesse vnfürfortunate, than had bene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas, & shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Atolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaians, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and Lacedemonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entering into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such haste they made, for feare of being overtaken. But flight, hee said, was not alwayes prosperous: hee should one day light vpon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words: and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, ranfomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, hee fell vpon the Atolians: whom he drave into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Countrey. This done, he tooke leaue of the Achaians: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subiects, or dependents: and animated them so well, that they reeled fearelesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, all neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred galleies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make strong warre vpon the Atolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy; caused them to giue out the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Atolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie five galleies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Atolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium & Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Countrey round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the walls of Apollonia, making some Outrages of peace: which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Atolians, as had Philip, to take in cuil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desir'd, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Aetolian Pyracies. Only once they came to his help, which was, at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arrivall: having done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Nauie, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechelesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue bene one of Hanno his trickes, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly, to heare that so great a King made off to serue in person vnder Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Enuic could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thrifit course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges: and secde the Macedonian with hopes, by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing; yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once hee was engaged in the warre, be vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal cury day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betwene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Affricke, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such iniuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hauefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in their little courties which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he beganne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Aetolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, hee might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their fakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and he vnable to manage it.

The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the counsaits, that somewhat might seeme to haue bene gotten. On the other side, the Aetolians were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably coniectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did so the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prousias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boetians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilum, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus, Pleuraus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedaemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Aetolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Athenians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour, and loyed to beare a part, though they did nothing in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a buie people, and mislited occasion to renew the warre, when meanes did better serue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-wealth.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had bene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the lesse harmfull, if their care of Italy had bene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Posthumus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaulle; the beginne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Ile of Sicily; as also that warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannae, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates; would vnto the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, yet at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered interuall to Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their severall Armies. This had not bene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had bene thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hope and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue bene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender troups, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spainne; the lingring aide which they sent, to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and amongst all these their attempts, their hastie catching at Sicily: little deferred to bee thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather euerie one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no other wise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were ieiulous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessity; so to feed his Italian friends with hopes, and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumae, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great menaile; his forces being then diuided, and employed in sundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was, euen in those dayes, a strong Citie; and required a yeeres worke to haue taken it by force.

C c c c c

Wherefore

Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrated. Vpon the towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campanians) to be present at a tolemne sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: as promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to enertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue beene Posthumus Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being iudged the fittest man to an encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they faigned so to haue done, because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal, among the Campanians: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intente to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had bene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, He continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skillfull in the exercises of warre, than to keepe him from quarrels, that might arise by vbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word of all that had passed betwene them and the Campanians. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence hee issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campanians. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Albius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foueteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather doubting how to surpris others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meate and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuan vnwares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loosing not aboue an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rife it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farr off. By this his prouidence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to find those young soldiers, and slaues, busied in making spoile; and loading themselves with the booty. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the *Capuan*s, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this towne. They raised a wooden Towre against it; which they brought close vnto the walls, thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Towre: whence they made resistance; and found means at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busied in quenching the fires, the Romans, gillyng out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about foueteene hundred. The Consul wisely founded the Retreat: ere his men were too farr engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of this good successe, adventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, nere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About the times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small townes were recovered by the Romans; & the people severely punished for their revolt.

The

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had need; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall inuasion vpon the whole Country; to passe from place to place, and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samniters was grievously waied by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe; to get the Souerainie. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouer-burdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old, the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intente, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formality, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what neede the Citie stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, serued to put the Campanians in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest enreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Putoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garrison in Putoli was fixe thousand strong: and did their due so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could only shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assayed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein hee had very great intelligence. Whilest hee was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a Iourney against Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, halting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell, Hanno had with him about fouenteene thousand foot, Brutians and Lucians for the most part; besides twelue hundred horse, very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moors. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceiued, to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his soldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late armed slaues, had received from their Generall a peremptory despatching; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their liberty, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in casting forth: whether that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by employment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his owne troupe, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should waite away the heads; and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie intimatedly after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong vpon the Enemy; whom their desperate furie had souke ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard vpon the Romans battell; that foure thousand of the slaues, (for sense either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly bechue the slaues) retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Army was broken; being viable to remedy the losse. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his soldiers that reward of libertie which he had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had cooiled

unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eate nor drink otherwise than standing, vnlesse sicknesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Benueentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publique by the townsmen, some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaves manumitted) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was after ward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hania, being things of so small importance.

Those the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasure was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worke doe than before; as lying vpon the same trade, and subiect to the same inconueniencies, which enserued Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to holde so them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them sustained his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the popl, yet must it be faire lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spain; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved vpon the onely course, without the which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Quintus Fulvius the Pretor laid open the publique waues; and plainly sayd, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needfull to the Soule-diet; but war such as had stiffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loans of their commodities, and labours, until the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnder-taken by private men, and the Armie in Spain as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had bene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intencive to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselves in this present warre. They beganne with L. Caelius Metellus: who, after the battell at Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had bene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the messige of their fellowes made prisoners at Canna, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into the Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen who before had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed. Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as other wise it had yfed to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serue until the end of the warre, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to choise or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnchaste or vnchastly behaviour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publique Horles of seruice, vnto such as they thought meete; or tooke them away for their misbehaviour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rancke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Dieties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moraltie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encreased vpon the streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserve the dignitie of the Senate: the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Censors, which were alwayes of that Order, and careful to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had bene accustomed, in more happy times; to vnder-take such pieces of worke, offered now themselves willingly to the Censors, as if there had bene no such want: promising liberally their cost and trauell, with our expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had bene enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebare the price of them, until the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as equitie was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and thence the store kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the sustentance of these Widowes and Orphans, whilst the whole stocke was vsed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Squidiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Athenians, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in so great want.

These welch hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded halfe so much commoditie; as might be layed in ballance against these miseries, wherein their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless, if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Ligencies, whom shee forthwith vnder-tooke, than in abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion; whereto shee attained; so that the young stock of those men was dead, whose names we haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solid: and by pruning the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the King of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from euery particular Citizen, all hopes of other felicity, than that which rested in the common-happinesse of the whole state. (Cicero obserues, as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimensions or frame is small; may apply serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie; which easily comes to fall, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside; and euery mans care addressed on the benefit of his Countrey. Hereof I might say, that our English scene a great example, in the vnted Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of these Townes, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme industrie, and straining themselves to fill their publique Treasure, they are all growne wealthy, (strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore it we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and about all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: wee may truly say, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deuiant otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason haue bene more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Cittizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleueed their owne interest to be as great, in those warres which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue bene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: VVho, though he hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subiect vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIII.

The Romans winne some Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generalls abroad omitted no part of industrie, in seeking to recover what had bene lost. The towne of Casiline Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garrison; and likely to haue bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague: Nevertheless the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to giue it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. Hee said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue bene vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted vnto the best effect: So the siege held on; and the towne was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearful; and craved parlee, offering to giue it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus seizing vpon a Gate; entered with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul: who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deferred commendations; by holding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heere of execution, could be excused by Marcellus: It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation; but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like fort was Mount Marsian in Gaietigne taken by the Marshall Manlius, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their fetherall guards, vpon the first desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed: The Marshall therefore discouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entered by Scalado, and put all saue the Governour into the sword. Herein that Governour of Mount Marsian committed two grosse errors; the one in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for alliaunce giuen and receiued. Some such ouer-sight, the Governour of Casiline seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, nor by Manlius, was very honorable.

table. When this Worke was ended, many small townes of the Samites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about sixe and twenty thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grievously waisted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thrust so many men into it, that the traitours durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, having wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrey, but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So hee departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and beganne to victual it, when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne, in which regard if he beganne his winter more timely, than otherwise he required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessity enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrey.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicil, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique seruice, to imploy often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: eleven of the twelue Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe, which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The father cheerefully did so, saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest vnderstand thy selfe to be Consul. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Cittizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannae, had holpen the Carthaginian into that towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a patterne to all traitors; vnto him, as Camillus and Fabritius had done those, that offered their vnfaithfull seruice against the Falisci, and King Pyrrius. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and sayd, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the towne of Cules, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that hee might seeme rather seuer, than couetous, he sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which hee wonne by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the towne, and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust forth by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the towne-men suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdome, to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had bene betrayed by their Princes; and were become subiect to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proceesse of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Consul: and receiuing his faith for security of the Towne, presently presently made head against the garriſon. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibal men continued to make good reſiſtance. For when almoſt a thouſand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and ſerue on the Roman ſide, it was yet covenanted, That the Carthaginians ſhould be ſuffered to paſſe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and ſo Arpi became Roman againe, with little other loſſe, than of him that had betrayed it. About the ſame time, Cliternum was taken by the Romans. This was a thing of ſmall importance: but conſidering the generall hatred of the Campanians toward Rome, it ſerued to diſcouer the inclination of the Italians in thoſe times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of thoſe mighty ſuccours, that had beene promiſed from Carthage. The Conſentines alſo, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yielded themſelves to Hannibal, returned againe to their olde allegiance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himſelfe a Capitaine, and; often reputation by ſome petty exploits in foraging the Countrey, was ſlaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of thoſe that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it ſeemed that it would ſtand him in good ſtead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to ſend. Long he waited, ere hee could bring his deſire to paſſe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligences, He contented himſelfe, with taking in ſome poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accompliſh their purpoſe, and his will. One Phileas, that was of their conſpiracie, who lay: it Rome as Embaſſadour, praſtifying with the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, and ſuch as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his company were the next day ſo cloſely purſued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they ſuffered death as traitors. By reaſon of this cruelty, or ſueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conſpirators, they followed their buſineſſe the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were expected, if their intention ſhould happen to be diſcouered. Wherefore they ſent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the ſame compoſition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the town: on hunting by night, as if they durſt not take their pleaſure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they miſſed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not ſeeme to haue beene abroad vpon other occaſion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourney to Tarentum, if he ſhould haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This cauſed his long abode in one place to be ſuſpected: as alſo to make his Enemies the more ſecure, Hee cauſed it to be ſaid, that he was ſicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careleſſe of ſuch his neighbourhood, and the Conſpirators had ſet their buſineſſe in order, He tooke with him ten thouſand the moſt expedite of his horſe and foot; and long before breake of day, made all ſpeed thitherward. Fourſcore light horſe of the Nomidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare left he, and his troupe following him, ſhould be diſcouered. It had beene often the manner of ſome few Nomidian horſe, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that ſome Nomidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a ſigne, that Hannibal was not as yet diſſeigned; and gave ſo order, that ſome companies ſhould be ſent out the next morning, to ſtrip them of their bootie, and ſend them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came cloſe to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to ſhew his arrival, Nico, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in ſigne that he was ready. Preſently Nico beganne to ſet vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whiſtling (as was his manner) called vpon the Porter; bidding him make haſte, for that he had killed a great Boare, ſo heauy, that ſcarce two men could ſtand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket and forthwith forthwith entered two young men, laden with the Boare; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter ſtood wondering at the largeneſſe of the beaſt, Philomenes ran him through with his Boare-ſpeare: and letting in ſome thirtie armed men, ſell vpon all the watch; whom when hee had ſlaine, hee entered the great gate. So the Artificer of Hannibal, entering Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place, where both parts met. Thence they were diſtributed by their Generall, and ſent into all quarters of the city, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conſpirators, that when any of their friends appeared in ſight, they ſhould bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the towne was in an uproare: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpeter was vnſkilfully founded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the ſuſpicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to ſpoyle the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boate, got into the Citadell, that ſtoode in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might eaſily perceiue the next morning, how all had paſſed. Hannibal, aſſembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderſtand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly againſt the Romans, as tyrannous oppreſſors; and ſpake what elſe hee thought fit for the preſent. This done: and hauing gotten ſuch ſpoile as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne; hee addreſſed himſelfe againſt the Citadell, hoping that if the Garriſon would fallie out, hee might giue them ſuch a blow, as ſhould make them vnable to defend the Pecee. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when hee beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauerie ſallying forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell backe of purpoſe according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and ſo farre from their ſtrength, as they durſt adventure. Then gaue Hannibal a ſigne to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpoſe: and ſecretly ſetting vpon the Enemy, draue him backe with great ſlaughter, as faſt as hee could runne; ſo that afterwards hee durſt not iſſue forth. The Citadell ſtood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall againſt the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawſey. This cawſey Hannibal intended to fortiſie in like ſort againſt the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themſelves from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went ſo well forward, without impediment from the beſieged, that hee conceiued hope of winning the Pecee it ſelfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made ready all ſorts of engines, to force the place. But whileſt he was buſied in his workes, there came by Sea a ſtrong ſupply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of preuailling, & made him returne to his former counſaile. Now ſo farre as the Tarentine fleet lay within the hauen, and could not paſſe forth, whileſt the Romans held the Citadell: it ſeemed likely, that the towne would ſuffer want, being debarred of accuſtomed trade and ſo provisions by Sea: whileſt the Roman garriſon, by help of their ſhipping, might eaſily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Againſt this inconuenience, it was rather wiſhed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the hauens, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all ſupply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne ſtanding in plaine ground, and their ſtreets being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he vnderooke, and effected: whereby the Roman garriſon was reduced into great neceſſitie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwiſe buſied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall loſſe on both ſides, the time paſſed: and the Roman forces, growing daily ſtronger, Q. Fuluius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately choſen Conſuls, prepared to beſiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and haſtie growth from that want of men, and of all neceſſaries, whereinto the loſſe at Canna had reduced them. But to fill vp theſe Legions, they were faine to take vp young Boyes, that were vnder ſeuenne yeeres of age: and to ſend Commiſſioners about fifty miles round, for the ſeeking out of ſuch Lads as might appeare ſerueiceable, and preſſing them to the wars, making yet a Law, That their yeeres of ſerueice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, ſhould be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning ſo young, as if they had beene of lawful age.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campani felt great want of victuall, as if they had already bene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeres made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to store themselves with victualls, that hee would prouide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantitie of graine, that had bene layd vp in Citties round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than foure Cartson Wagons, with a few packe-horses, as if this had bene enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesse of the Campani. Hanno was exceeding angry herat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not reach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day; against which he made prouision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night; where with diligence hee made inquite into the behaviour of the Enemy. Hee learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Caraus and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great haust. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneuentum, hee marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, hee had wel-nere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued; the lesse desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore hee sayd, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow Consul with the rest of his Armie; and to lie betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Campani should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to sound the retreat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great boote; or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers aduerture so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men; changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them; that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue sixe thousand; and taken, aboue ten thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of bootie; that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misaduenture, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that hee was wont to protest vnto their Cittie; and how hee had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Aspi was lately, if hee gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, whilst he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which hee saw in so many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Graecia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the Citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurians would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies launce in their Towne;

Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuerthelesse, they helped themselves by cunning; inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their seruice to Atinius, the Roman Capitaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formality they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans, in sauing Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practise) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this dispute lasted not long: for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls supplying Beneuentum to secure their backs, addrested themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprize. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Consul, was slaine, either by treachery of some Lucani, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian traitors, among whom he fell vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans, to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the backe of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hindrance of that business. The Volones or Slaves lately manumitted, tooke their Ensignes, and went euery one whither he thought good; as if they had bene discharged by the deesse of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuerthelesse, the Consuls went forward with their work; and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hostility they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; insomuch that hee caused them to dislodge. They remoued by night, and went severall wayes: Fulvius towards Cannae, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who hauing led him a great walke, fetched a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centurius a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not farr from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand; and he himselfe being a proper man, and talking brauely gathered vnto many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, hee gaue prooffe of the difference, betwene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cneius Fulvius, a Roman Pretor with eightene thousand men, was in Apulia, very curlesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which hee held, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when hee should haue cutt off those forces, that lay in the Provinces about, vnder men of small ability. Coming vpon Fulvius, hee found him and his men so iolly, that needes they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battell to Fulvius, hee soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliue; leauing all, save two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, receiued the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuerthelesse, all care was taken, to gather vp the final reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate downe before the towne and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would issue out of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, should haue his pardon, and be suffered to enioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously reiected the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long iourney, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as brauely re-comforted. Hee bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the City; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, hee was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time; and therby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered, and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The townsmen of it then sallied out; rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foote was easily beate) the Romans vied to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirnish. In these exercises the Campan vially had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy, who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some-what and courageous young men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes, leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whol power, in as terrible maner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of vserviceable people on the walls, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campan, easily defended his Trenches against them, and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length backe into their City. Neuertheless, in pursuing them to their gates. He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian array. The Roman camp was euen at poynt to haue bin lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch, and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assaultants. It is sayd, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine well, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine citadell, had well-nere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, to come set vpon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of waite that threatened Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one

one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campan, should well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, lest the Campan, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeild themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Nimidian: who running as a fugitive into the Roman Campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The journey to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddenesse of his arrivall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Army ouer the Riuer of Fulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generalls by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly sayd, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would sue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generalls at Capua, to do as they thought behouefull: & if it might conveniently be, whether to raise their siege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much aduantage. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fiftene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the chiefe of his whole Army: with which he hastid toward Rome, leaving App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Fulturnus, burnt vp all his boates; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or assault him. Then hastid he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than hee needed must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregella: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grievously to spoyle their lands, whilst the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that hee drew to Rome, the greater waste hee made: his Nimidians running before him; drining the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were filled with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vn certaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was halting to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City in time of such need, an Aete was passed, That hee should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another: Fulvius hauing bene long held occupied in passing ouer Fulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Country was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fulvius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater, so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anten, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way vnder the walls, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driuen away, without doing, or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. About the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans; there were some twelue hundred then in Rome: which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, wherewith was thought that their seruice might be vsfull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed to nor from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great vproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noyse was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattaile, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was stoppt vp: and the poore Numidians pittifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not bene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and pretended to tell to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vndertooke it. It is sayd, that a terrible snowe of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their severall Campes: and that this hapned two dayes together, the weather breaking vp and clearing as soone as they were departed asunder: certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes provision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parred (as is sayd) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared little before the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped wel, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipios, was sent out of the towne, and went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause knowne, or no cause answerable to the greatnes of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause hisouldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of their wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish vproare in his army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Assie into the campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, & augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that tear, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very peece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bene in time of peace. This indignity coming to his care, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made import-sale of the Siluer-smiths shoppes, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be vnto that peece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seeke to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued, Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himselfe, this iourney had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake vp his Campe: and doing what

spoile he could in the Roman Territories, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest ouer the Countrey, and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arriuall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gaue it lost: and is likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hanno; which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie, since hee had no other way to vent his griefe.

Ennius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeeld, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Ennius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, euerymans conscience of his owne euill defaults, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Roflar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey such Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was vndertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues out of the Towne, into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could coueigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Roflar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that hee would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (sayd they) wee came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions where soeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be ready to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue wee gotten those victories at Tribia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that hee would not dishonour himselfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising to make a desperate fallie, if he would once more aduventure to set vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Roflar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) hee was vanquished by Hanno.
 30 and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bene sent ouer by the Hammonians, to obserue the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were so, iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessitie. How soeuer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfaite fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Campanians; so that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yielding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had bene most forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies sought vpon their bodies. About seuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poyson. All the rest hoping for more mercie than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Towne-gates was set open; whereto a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all; and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; some to Cales; others to Thurinum. Touching the generall multitude, they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vied by Ennius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduerty. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued: yet was he not inexorable to the Campanians as hauing loved them wel in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pacurnius, of whom we spake before. But this facility his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance: for feare, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behoufull to the common safetie, and honour of their State. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theannum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he strucke off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campan: and bred a general inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatines, people of the Campan, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, & want of ability to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen, burning with fire of Reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualtie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out, and the Campan being detected by a slave of their owne (to whom about his liberty promised, was given about the summe of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to 30 their delicts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had bene an harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliberation: but the generallitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certayne day, and confined vnto severall places as best liked the angry victors. As for the towne of Capua, it was suffered to 30 stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein onely a Roman Prouost was every yeere sent to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being fire spent; and that which should haue reuiued his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

Worst things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quick and happy end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirty thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Hariscoras with his sonne Hyoilus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Countrey. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so careless, as in the rest of their maine undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had bene better, if 50 their care had bin directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italy, whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Hariscoras with his followers might well enough haue serued to drue out Quintus Mutius the Prætor, who lay sicke in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But whilst they fought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise enterprise was such; as may seeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed, the Bald, with a competent fleet and armie; assisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion; and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barbantine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares: so beaten and in such euill plight, that the Sardinians had euenspent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelue 10 hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preferue and vp-hold in their severall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had bene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approved meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius, retayned in obedience 10 all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Hariscoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: hee landed at Calariu or Caralliu, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemie. Hyoilus, the sonne of Hariscoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needes adventure to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So hee rashly ad- ventured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee receiued a terrible ouerthrow; 30 and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyoilus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornu, the chiefe Towne of the Iland: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as hee might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to sue the Towne of Cornu, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calariu: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance, their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calariu: where if hee had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would 40 haue fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their strength. For after some small made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thousand. Four hours the battell lasted, and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of yong Hyoilus, and of his father Hariscoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornu; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space wonne the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornu, and yielded vnto the Roman; who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best sorted with the nature of their severall offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calariu with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome, leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil was of greater length, and euery way more burdnesome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely sauers of their owne, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Countrey, by annexing the citie and dominion of Syracuse, so that which they enjoyed before. Soone after after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend vnto the Romans, and greatly releued them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fiftene yeares of age, Gelo his sonne, that should haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successor, Hiero appointed fiftene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he iudged most likely to preserue the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a litle while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many coadiutors, beganne to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeares; and sayd, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he caused others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to passe, in a sort, as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly ouer to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behauiour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that in course of life, he would reniue the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, lustfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoide the danger of his displeasure; that seemed worse than death it selfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraso continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but nor of his Cabiners. These, howeouer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thraso, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtful, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his person, was detected by a groom of his, to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture, he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thraso; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were neare in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streetes, and neuer shrank for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all escaped, and soone after found meanes to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thraso was taken out of the way, quickly resolued vpon siding with the Carthaginians, whetoe he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great needfullie, had of late bene such, as might haue bene termed excessiue, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things present; the weakenesse of Rome; the prevalent fortunes of Carthage; and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entered into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicles, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betwene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoff. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learne how to accommodate himselfe, saying, That he could hardly beleue the Carthaginians to so wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Hauing thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at first; that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion: but afterward, that he should reigne ouer all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At these dolings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his iourney, as much discountenanced him when hee came into Sicily, and forbade him to looke bigger. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessity, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But in stead of returning the money with thanks, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noised abroad that he should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (wherof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine-glorie, and send word after him, that he should consign that money ouer to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiving, as must needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime & scorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innoation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicles, of whom wee spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men, to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fiftene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a city of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden: as he was passing through a narrow street: and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the found of that word so ioyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Army, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcase to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signifye all that had passed, to stirre vp the people to libertie, and to preuent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to usurpe a Tyranny. The *Syracusan*s hereupon presently tooke Armes, and made themselves masters of their owne City. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; betwene desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise mis-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vied, That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haied out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse backe. But feare, and better counsaile prevailed to farre, that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter, dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that hee had stood in feare, lest they would not haue containeyd themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer, he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had been an

eull master both to him and them. Hercupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Cittie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignty, and so vehement were the indignations of his wife, that shortly hee beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had bene with the Syracusians Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilst he liued, what seruice they could, and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling to into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little coulesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of his troublesome couple, which were good fouldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Han- nibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and that they should cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had greened of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Hiernonia the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, hee revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hercupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were thence out of hand: and afterward ascended to the People, of all the eull which they had done, whilst Hieronymus liued, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessory to this wicked treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recovered their royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossest. These daughters therefore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demaratus, and Hiernonia had perhaps deserved this heauy sentence: but Heraclia, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sossippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash iudgement. Her husband Sossippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that respect loved by Hiernonymus, that being sent Em-bassador to king Protonotus, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Aegypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, to affect the multitude; that (pardoning their flaws) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satiate their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rout, not onely of the poorer Citi- zens, but of fouldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the olde Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generally cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betwene the Syracusians and the Romans. But having tried all in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily, they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary fouldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse.
 Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the

the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides tearing to fufaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more delirious to fet forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himfelfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perfwaded to rebell againft the Syracufans. For he faid, that fince they had all of late fcrud one Mafter, there was little reafon why the Leontines fhould not be enfranchifed by his death, as well as the Syracufans; yea or much rather, all things confidered; fince in their ftreets the Tyrant was flayne, and liberty firft proclaimed. Wherefore, fince they of Syracufe were not contented to enioy the freedome purchafed among the Leontines; but thought it good reafon, that they fhould beare Dominion ouer thofe that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that fuch their arrogant fhould be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prefcription. Hereunto occafion was giuen by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracufans. For it was agreed, That all which had bene fubieft to Hiero and Hicronymus, fhould henceforth be Vaffals vnto the State of Syracufe. Againft this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due, Epicides told them, that in this notable change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had loft not many ages before. Neither was it vnreafonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had bene fubieft by the fame hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracufans. But fceeing they had long fince yielded vnto Syracufe, and bene fubieft vnto that Citie, by what forme fouer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather reafonable, than ill. Neuertheleffe, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: in fo much, that when meffengers came fooner after from Syracufe, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done againft the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they fhould get them gone, either to Locri, or whither elfe they lifted, fo that they flayed not in Sicill: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requefted the Syracufans, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themfelves bound to obferue the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory anfwer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracufans; who offered him their affiftance in doing iuftice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better fatisfaction: but forth-with tooke the bufineffe in hand, which he difpatched in one day. At the firft affault, Leontium was taken: all leue the Caffe, wherinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and ftealing thence away by night, conueyed themfelves into the towne of Herbefus. The firft thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the fame, which other Roman Captains vfed after victory, to fecke out the fugitive Roman flauders, and renegades, whom he cauled all to die: therewith both of the Towne-men and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy, forbearing alfo to ftrip or fpoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary fort. It was fayd, that he had flaine, Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Towne to facke. Thefe newes met the Syracufan Army vpon the way, as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his bufineffe before. About eight hundred Mercenaries there were, that had bene lent forth of Syracufe, vnder Sefis and Dinomenes, two of the Pretors, to ferue againft the Leontines and other rebels. Thefe Captains were honeft men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had thofe diflikes, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-fouldiers (as now they termed thofe againft whom they went) had bene fo cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it beft, to turne their vniquiet thoughts another way, and fet them a worke in fome place elfe: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their feruice. So worde Herbefus they march'd; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, deuifing what further harme they might doe; but now fo weakly accompanied, that they feemed vnable to elcape the punifhments belonging to their offences paft. Hereof the two brethren were no leffe well aware: and therefore aduentured vpon a remedy little leffe desperate than their prefent cafe. They iffued forth of Herbefus vnarmed; with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and fo prefented themfelves to the Army. Six hundred men of Cree were in the vanguard, the that had beene well vsed by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed the m. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by severity, which would not serue. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in yrons; the exclamation was so violent against them, that faime they were let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara, wher they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick, whereby to help himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Cretians, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusians Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offenseful, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeited Epistle was openly rehearsed, the vproare was such, that Safis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and flic for their liues. All the Syracusians remayning behinde, had beene cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued amongst the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witness. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (sayd some) was the auarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might haue beene tempted with a farre greater booty. Whilst they were thus discourfing, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnto for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entred and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neare with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enioy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had beene to him, he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatened; he told them; they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned backe into the City. Immediately beganne the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wals as compassed Syracuse, being manned with with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vs, did more mischief to the Romans than could haue beene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discourfing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remooue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing; whereon a man might stand. For prooffe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preferre the City from danger of enemies. To such Mechanical workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an iniury done vnto the liberal sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man to wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappy fate of great inventions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; & things, that euery one could well haue performed. Herof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he vnder went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may fee most apparent prooffe. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentsors any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes, which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wifemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could flubber things easily on, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is kinde of iniustice, that the long trauels of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; yeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and kineth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appaare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be perterred by euill men to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irreuerable poyson: much better it were, that such a iewell remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischief. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse, not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but referred so much to his owne

direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done speciall benefit to his Countrey. For to enricht a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinguereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundrie devices, of which any one fort might haue repelled the assaillants: but all of them together shewed the multiplictie of his great wit. He shot heavy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships, which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay fare off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rocks: and all of them were to be beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assaill. In the like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones & timber, falling vpon it like hail; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery, and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assaill. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could early before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blanche, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woodd vp hard to shoot a great compassse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaillants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were unable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceiued any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; hee might haue holpen by some device, to make them vnseruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vlie them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very deperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likelie so loone to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates aduerted of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that fise and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbasus, which yeldd vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrirentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backe toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he vsed, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foote, and fise hundred horse, horse; intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him; ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the disperst and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a litle to keepe the Skilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places revolted vnto the Carthaginians, and flew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intencie to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrirentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnble to preuaile: & he himself was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not fittible, an enterprize that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaied to preuaile by treason against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Towne would haikent no parole. At length a slave vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse, where hee talked in priuate with some few, as hee had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to send him aduertisement of their proceedings, by a sliker boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of foure score, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discoerced; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, that had beene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Arte of Geometrie, fell to numbing the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had bene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surpris. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great fleet was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be well wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiuall night, came vnto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or fise, if Eppola were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he hid the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie then before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to harken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those that were sheltered vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfortified of his helpe; since they held out a good while and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegados, were more carefull than ever to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilce, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilce came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicides sallied out of Areadina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Affailants were repelled. Neuerthelesse, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as streightly besieged, as hee himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed, together with the two Capitaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat losse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countre service: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. Hee arrived at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid, being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicides out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much inreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, hee stood off into the deepe; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durst not Epicides returne into Syracuse, but went to Agigentum: where he expected the issue, with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could safely, vnto Marcellus; and some of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. Thee had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicil was giuen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Heereunto Marcellus willingly gaue care: for hee had staid there long enough; and had cause to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. Hee therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; that they should be Masters of their owne, enjoying their libertie and proper lawes; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Heereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors chosen; and the gates euen ready to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, that the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke Arms, and fell vpon the new chosen Pretors; whom they slue, and made election of fixe Capitaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting onely the fugitives. The Treatie was therefore againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delayed, eyther by some feare of the Citizens, that had scene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the sack of Epipola, Tyche, and 30
Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vie the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect to Rome. Mericius a Spaniard was one of the fixe Capitaines, that had been chosen in the last commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Capitaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Romane Embassadors, dailie p. fting to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mericius, that the Romans had already gotten all Spaine; and that if euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where else; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Capitaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.
40

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusians, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requited with the ruine of his Countre: much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercinaries, should minister

vnto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hanniball, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronimus; and now of Iato, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had bene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselves had also bene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rafalicie, and some ill aduised Persons ioyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Laontium; and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargain vnder-hand against them, with a Capitaine of the Mercinaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good vltimate time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthy, strong, and many waies important. Neuerthelesse if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefs wherunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill-neighbours; and by that very forme of policie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly asseme, That it receiued no 20
10
small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forreine enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthe Citizens, as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the iealousie, wherein they held their libertie inuaine. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse; as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues 30
not to make iniustice the more excusable: vnto us should approue the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to haue stolen a siluer cup from a sicke man, said, Hee neuer leaues drinking.

By the treason of Mericius, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein, the booty that it found, was said to haue bin no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was maruellously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; save onely the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by
Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that hee harkened not to the noyse, and vpror in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which hee first found out. An Invention of so little vse, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the deuising of all those engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had bin spent vpon a sonne, whose studies in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans, except Agigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hanniball. This Mutines by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and nor behaue themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and droue them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno; especially in Hanno, that that hauing bene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal. In that hee had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside vnto Heraclæa, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemy, vntill his returne. So much therefore the more, therewith Hanno fight; and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies, farre greater were the odds betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authority by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclæa; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countreman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day, but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had bene misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did foolishly set vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agrirentum.

If Hanno could haue bene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly haue bene reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew manie of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cannæ, tooke it very haughtily, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, & not suffered to return backe to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Countreman the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what hee could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Army lately ouerthrowne had bene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recovered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country; yet hee hindered the Country from reuoluing vnto Mutines. About threescore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Agrirentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as hee pleased, in despite of the Romans: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied, whilst Italy was neglected, that should haue bene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spitefull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countreman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Laetius, the Roman Consull, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these

these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countreman had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agrirentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicily. The Consull was glad of this friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vnder-taken. For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereto they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had bene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had bene well acquainted with of late. But when, making halste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Bark, set saile for Africke; leaving all his Army and Adherents in Sicily, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Laetius the Consull hauing taken Agrirentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of Steele: which may haue bene the reason, why Laetius dealt so cruelly with the Agrirentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great halste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason; and sixe onely staid to be wonne by force. These things done, Laetius returned home to Rome, carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agrirenta; that were a companie of out-lawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theuillish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipios in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very speciall seruice. So by this enterprize of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue bene employed in Italy: leaving yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metanurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicily, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesse Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Army behinde him in the Prouince. He staid not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Laetius, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consull Marcellus, by the Syracusanians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consull, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Canniffum, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall tearmes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enoughto entertaine his enemie with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the coming of Adrabal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his mento be lustie, and to bear soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffice them to be at quiet: vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of make. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had bene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumcument by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vexed them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be careful to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motiues continued the same, and his men had bene hartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at a deare rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For it eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuthelesse it sufficed, that Fabius, the Consul here-by got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Fulius, the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscientes, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulius entertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had bene authours, or busiedoers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Lucius had lately brought from Aguerna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, late downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, she gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistis, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this; and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie, especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he intended to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choise of his men, came in great incinto the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and broke open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenus, with those that before had let in Hannibal, yielded now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vfed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue bene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby spoiled of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasure, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols, that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this businesse was done, he halted away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue lost their Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul, he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen, or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Romans, the iourney to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; saue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue to bene rid of them. But their common pouerty, & disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legions of Canna, and those vnhappy Companies, that had bene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fulius, were transported into Sicily; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had bene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of mony: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare, or rather the best that they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him; whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof other wise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disability of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campanians or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eightene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe what soeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was to highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismiss them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deserting.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italy. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priue treasure; and thence take out the gold that had been layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to provide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, then at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driven to furnish the Armie in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Linus rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arrivall.

M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spain, though he came not into Italy vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Cannae, Hannibal had lost much time about Cuma and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haue, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italy, where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from harkening

to any sollicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poeerty of the Roman, and the wearinesse of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were deuising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Proprietors; partly by terrour of seuerie iudgements and inquisition; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils; and tooke many hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no need to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and fought to take them at some advantage; reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but fought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced; if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betwene Tarentum and Locri, wher into the Romans fell: and hauing lost about three thousand of their company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no advantage. There lay betwene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-grown with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscovered, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe, and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselves close, and attend their best aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neerer enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels; and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellowes; who discovered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe. The rest of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Fff

Presently

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was flaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Rings; withing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where hee would, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needefull. The deuice was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengfull minde, which he bare against that Citie, because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent backe the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue, without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night, he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, & bade open the gates; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Tecri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantecurors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoever was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Common wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needefull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so nere vnto the Enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the alloy of a more staied wit. The fathers therefore endeauoured to ioyne vnto him in the Consulship M. Liuius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Liuius had bene Consul with L. Amilius Paulus, in the yere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them bene called into iudgement by the People: and this Liuius condemned; Amilius hardly escaping. Though it hath bene once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honourable men. For in the battaile of Cannae, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Amilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague, and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome; than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to call himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, hee is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee bene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Laetinius, being Consuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued private in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his carelesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Censors, to pull his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vied to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formall words, or in pulling from side to side, when the house was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some buisnesse weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood vp, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were chosen; such as rather feared to fill vp the number, than to answer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Liuius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common wealth stood in great neede; yet had not vied in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be chosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Laetinius, being both of them Patricians, could be ioyned with Claudius Nero; euery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Liuius. But Liuius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested iniuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; hee was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men breake in faire weather; but run vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulness, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alma. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer vpon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. Thus is wisdom often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were chosen Consuls. Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpe thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans vied at this time the seruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leaue and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in several parts of Italy, where neede seemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obseruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not stirre out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Asdrubal, until he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those, or the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeere, among the Cisalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Liuius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salenines; nere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was sent against Hannibal. Neuertheless the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Liuius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was already passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genoa, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would aduenture no further, then hee safely might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his seuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had beene, when L. Amilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare; left all diligence, wisdom and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not bene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should retorne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreame difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Canna: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arrived another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had fecmed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuer and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, defended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenies at his first letting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a peniue traine of Mouniees: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like fort they had giuen attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them retorne aliuie, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Livius, that he should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answere, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iourne into Italie; such mention hath already beene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Liuie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the Citie of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Prouince: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their owne side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthe sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courtes vnderaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicill with Atimetus, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island; we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needefull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more carnell malice. Neuerthelesse Asdrubal was a good Patriot: as Mutines could not long digest. His iourne into Italie being resolved vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of siluer; whence hee was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Capitaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue beene so great, as it must haue beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staid behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tages. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenies: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gisco; that though himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof, hee would Scipio haue stopped his iourne into Italie, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had sent to keepe the Pyrenies as the defense of hard passages commonly is to no good effect; he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaul, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well furnished, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made: but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countre, whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vpon with Ice and Snow. The Mountaineers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iourne ouer the Alpes, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauielled through their Countre. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily persuaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cataille, and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painefullly scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proceesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre distoynd asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also ioyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arrived in their Countre. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions, of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first brui of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about forrie thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countre of the Brutians, there to increase his forces; which were otherwile too weake for the iourne intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuerthelesse he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to retorne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie, he assaied againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Ausidum to Cannusium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countre very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Cannusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once hee had gotten in the same open Countre. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue beene vnderdone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victory, in the naked Champs about Canna; if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reason afterward to say; that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted; as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placetia, and drew on-wards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Linus the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing joyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioynded as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howeuer the fortune of Rome should auid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate aduerture, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choyce of his Armie: and making thew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessities for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Senas Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his iourne thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his coming. Linus thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert vntill darke night, and then crept secretly into the campe: lest the Enemy, perceiuing this access of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioynded with them on the way. Neuerthelesse, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few dayes after their wearie iourne, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might beimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit, perceiuing that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue bene vndertaken, without this their coming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generals pavilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had bene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted drifing, after a long iourne. Hereupon he beganne to withdraw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gave order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the Enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath bene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the

the quarter of Linus the Consul. Asdrubal greatly misied: and being well acquainted with the Roman Orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue and in good case, hee was not able to conceiue: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till hee might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces; hee had not cited hitherto, how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with over-strongly supplying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceiued, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the River Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did sleale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindered his speede: farre he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horse, and shued him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gauls, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe with his Africans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midt; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to shue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midt. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gauls; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiuing that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linus: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and putt all to rowe. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid aron every side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and shued themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode sithem. For when any of them, being sore wounded, beganne to waxe vnruly, and rush backe vpon their own battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the Equations following them; is said to haue bene the deuce of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linus. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue stricken with great patience, against many difficulties; wherinto he tell fall by the means of those Capitaines that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting bravely, he was slaine: Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Lucius, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree: For Lucius saith; that the Carthaginians had no lesse an overthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannae; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were slaine, fiftethousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and about foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at liberie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand; and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; to wit not onely in other kindes, but in gold and silver. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is so haue bene as rich as Lucius reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Asdrubal, a parallel vnto that of Cannae) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to haue bene slaine. The number of the prisoners hee doth not mention: but onely saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme that they were all Barbarians: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countrey, about their liues.

The ioy of this victorie was no lesse in Rome, then had bene the feare of the enemy. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Armie, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduventure, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure, and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staid behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? This did they talke; yet referring their enquire vnto the success; with libertie to appraise or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Marked place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready at hand vpon the Magistrates as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would aske euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of this victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians; and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to cerifie Hannibal of the misadventure, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terror of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That hee forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatness of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metanurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrey of the Brutians; and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remooue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For hee wanted men to defend defend so many places as hee held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesse compass in the vmoost corner of Italie; it being a Countrey of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vntied; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their haruest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consul tarried among the Cisalpine Gauls vntill the end of Summer, there to let things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Armie in that Prouince; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leaue to returne home; and that hee might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as hee well deserued. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not onely Lucius with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero, though leauijg his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Lucius made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers, because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Petrus Philo, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls; and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthe of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; save onely the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surpris. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him; that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Lucius therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundrie Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their Generall. But that which Lucius addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore appaant, that by his proper worth and vertue, hee kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill hee be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, took vpon them the charge of Spain, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to leaue a supply of men:

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meane to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately bene employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africke, and came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlike that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage, when that sonne of Amilcar, whose authoritie had bene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the fictitious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing alittle to let vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Country of the Celiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other persuasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while continued himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentive, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italie, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celiberians, who became his guides, that their Countymen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to these Celiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, in stead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago saved himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either flaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saved most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the coming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrey: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intente to the necessity and successe of his Countymen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well aduenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had bene sent ouer into Africke; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrey was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noyed abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly beuole the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprize in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vsed the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by assault the Towne of Origia.

Against the next yeeres danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Armie: and spared not cost, nor traualle, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With leuente thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore hee iudged it needfull to vie the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Celchus, that was Lord of eight and twenty Townes, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his seruice: he resolved to make vse of those, and some few others, that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee able to doe any great harme, if they would reuolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, hee fought out the Enemy; neere vnto whom hee was encamped. At his first coming, Mago and Masaniella fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But he layed certaine troups of horse in court: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly beooke themselves to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes betwene the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Asdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many daies: Asdrubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the euening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midle, with their Elephants before them; and opposit to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at some distance, many daies together: it grew to bee the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before designed. But Scipio when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier then he had bene wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traue out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vying herein the same tricke, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to encounter the Romans; whilst he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee encamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not bee discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat into their foote; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselves, were like to hold out better then the Enemy. But about noone hee caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leaving their battaile of Spaniards faire behinde them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers, leuied in haste, and fighting onely in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke at the same time, by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places, because of the Spanish battell which was coming against them, though it were as yet faire off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betwene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arrived, hee should haue found himselfe inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Cannae. Wherefore hee did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance ledde them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In process of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heate of the day.

Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gaue no ouer, till they had fort the enimie to change his pace and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderlie retreat; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished; ledde by the obstinate passion of feare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day bene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sodaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungrie, and ouerlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Astanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yielded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster then an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seven thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore hee resolved to make shift for one; and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence; hee tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masaniassa staid in it) whilst hee with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masaniassa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romanes; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Townes left, Iliturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans: of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saued themselves by flight in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Iliturgi had sometimes bene inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipios, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled; but with great crueltie betrayed, and slue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouerthrows. Astapa was a Towne that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and which was worse, had thriuen by the spoyle of the Romanes and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Iliturgi and Castulo: Iliturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius, or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Marketplace: whereinto was throwne all the gold, & siluer, with whatsoever else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a frowe guard; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made: all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe, where struing beyond their power, they were euery one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilst they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with fewen Gallies, leauing Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Majilli, a people of the Namidiens; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethinke himselfe, how to finish the war; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed that the helpe of Syphax would be much auailable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procrement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Captaine into Africke; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as hee thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the Citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africke; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lelut his Embassador, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Onely Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quingentene Gallies he tooke Sea: and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would haue been very dangerous to him, had he beene defiered by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would haue brought them to treat of peace; but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such Commission from the Senate. Hee feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Couenant; which in time of performance, hee as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell betwene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Iliturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath bene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end; hee performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that hee should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vsed in the Citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue prooff in single combat, of the valour that was in their loucfull Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to trial of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orfus, Cosen-gemans: that contended for the principality of a Towne called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orfus stood late seized of the Principality: which though himselfe receiued by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe backe; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but onely Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the soole-hardnesse of the younger.

Such combats haue bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux; and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betwene Paris and Meneas; the other, betwene Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betwene David and Goliath, and others performed by some of Dauids worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betwene twelue of the Tribe of Juda, and as many of the Beniaminites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curiatii that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great Combat fought betwene Edmond Ironside and Canutus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdome. The vie of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; al. nost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Blyss contending for the Duchie of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honor of the Nations, betwene thirtie of the Brittons, and thirtie Englisb: two of which Englisb, were Caluerlie: a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is defended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in Englisb, French, and Italian Historiis. Most of them haue bin combats of brauerie, and of gayete de cœur, as the French terme it; for honour of feuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, di. fious to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betwene Corbis and Orsua. Vnto these (we thinke) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betwene David and Goliath; or that betwene the Horatii and Curiatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is ad. ventured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betwene the Lord Henrie of Beulin: soke Duke of Hersford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir John Anley and one Cattington: whom Anley charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious. An g. Henr. 2. The like was fought betwene Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also, between a Nauarrois, & one Welch of Grimsby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if he bee vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proued; I cannot asseme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) be overcome, Hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Loy, or offered to do, in the reign of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe clesse, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was fo. ordinarie in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip le faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lord, made their profit here. by. For in the " Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vie when as any man hath had an hard or vnjust iudgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or berre, ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Duelli temere trials by battaile, that great learned man Two, Bilshop of Chartres, did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his letters to the Bilshop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie and kinde of triall, was reuente by S. Lewis, and Philip le faire, so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carroz against Jacques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countintman: wherein Sir Henric Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had to the victories; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deseruing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces defences per une demeurir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did faiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: eueniettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie mortallitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meaneft Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had patiently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of these occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Objection and Retiation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duells; as are founded vpon nicere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitful root of deadly quarrells. This is held a word so terrible, and a wring so vnpar. ceonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in halfe by the French Gentlemen, after the patterne of their King, is growne to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slave; the other to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them, vie nothing so much in their conseruation and course of life, as to speake and swear fully. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworn to pay the menies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as oft as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Liers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised so but he will pay money by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein hee faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath bene made. Nay, what is the profit of those that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice; and of all they haue, vied in their ordinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wile French man, deciding therein the Apill custome of his Countie) me marbè & complot fait ensemble se mocquer, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; a kinde of merchandise, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and to furre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vie; as he that vlieth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise; and those which men vse out of cowardise and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That whosoever giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath li'd, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promisseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knows that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not li'd; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine; and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Russian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life, giues it impertinently, and Russian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publicke with any truth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vnruth is vttered;) but all that is rude, ought not to be ciuillized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourses fauour of cowardize. It is true, if you call it cowardize to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand feuen-penic-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, then any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissimam tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitudo is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martirempaia; sic nec fortem pugna; sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as hee may iustly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe wee indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the iniuries offered vs, by the death of the iniurians. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reueng'd, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animsq; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne ingenuous and noble spirits the defence of their honors, being prest with iniuries? I say that I doe not, if the iniuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; do fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the Assailant. You will secondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and oppositeto that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-mang iues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England & other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of quality, who vpon neuer termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it, so did our Noble-men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important iniuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselves by battaile and publicke combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it denoteth murder) that is hath declared against a common Cur-purse or other Theues: Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Man-lai'er freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding, that is, to require iustice by Grand Affize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and hecurreth faith (for I vse his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-lai'er) be conuinc'd either by Great Affize or by Battaille, vpon that appeale; the Man-lai'er shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentle-men shall be repaired in honor, where an enemy taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, and children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may be felonie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should wee not submit our selues vnto the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recover our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe it may bee objected, That the losse of honour ought to be much more tearfull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publicke good? In these he that is employed and trusted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a trifolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is difficult; because euen and equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publicke good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Commonweale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame and reputation; as farre as reputation may sustaine iniurie by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confesse that wee haue done him wrong vnto whom wee haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that giues ill words in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduicement; hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to those that are seruile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, where-with he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, who struck M. de Plessis, pollicke a Russian coming behinde him, and (hauing the aduantage of companie, and his horses readie) shifed himselfe away on the sodaine, but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner: or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iustler cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wise man iudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntarie; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shameful; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weaknesse. Certainelie, as wife men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie injuries or suddaine injuries, that are not offered from malice forthought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valor; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For hee that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preferred; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chivalrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth homiebes, as that of Bulls do, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of seuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God vpon supricie Governours, than the permission.

His Maiestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in bearing down, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly fend; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer more. And we haue cause to hope, that his royal care shall bee no lesse happy in preuening the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous vanitie of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their severall degrees. There is much difference betwene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weaknesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betwene killing of a man in open field, with euery weapon; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias, though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forbidding his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouers violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by paysoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betwene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile, and lying in wait for blood, primly, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Maiestie now reigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queene Marie, vpon a nobleman of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, euery Age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Elbars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mouir Montaignu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolaistre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & étranglé. Who caused Montaignu great Master of France to die, to content his wife (so withe the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soon after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly defended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with some offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marseilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike trial. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conscience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Office, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating fallhood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation: Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquiere) à un Iuge pour demourer tousiours en soy, & ne laisser fléchir sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imagination faueur, qui pour fin de se le submerger, & faire le sion à all iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waues of imagination fauour, which in the end overwhelms them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vnderfermed, That hee was tryed, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

THE last businesse that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People; and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sicke, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainly perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rally fell vpon the Suesetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Countie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suero, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be afflicted with the like distemper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought easie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with the spoile of the Countie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Pंबर, to their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Pretors; as if this their election had bene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilest they were deuising, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected; there ariued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further ouer-

ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserved. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne; as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albius and Atrius with some thirtie other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; Hee called the Mutinies to assembly; and having them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inueighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albius and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were halcd to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded; as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued every man his pay when hee was sworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to bee quiet; but by the seueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them; and sending Laelius with all his horle to fetch a compasse about the Hills, & charge them in reare; hee ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preferre themselves and their estates, otherwise then by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio; and humbly craving pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes then formerly they had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades; and was met on the way by Masaniissa; who secretly promised to do him all seruice, if the People of Rome would send him to make War in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Armie of Gauls, and Ligurians, to ioyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades, without sparing either priuate men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthagens, hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned backe to repose himselfe a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him againe to enter into their Citie. By this he foresaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vn courteous dealing, he allured then Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vnto the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succcede him therein; and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his coming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bene granted vnto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans, might not, by the custome of those times, go farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Caesar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office, were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniissa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories against Aldrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spain into the treasury; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilst hee was buised in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuiue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which hee intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassages auail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deservedly; saying, That they were the most happy of all their Countymen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Neuerthelesse, when Scipio proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, even of the principall men, that vehemently gainesaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who seemed to haue bene troubled with that disease; which too often causeth men renowned for long approoued vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasury was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure bee recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe; if need required. Hereunto hee added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, then it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Aldrubal to passe into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which hee urged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere a Prouince: which the Consul neuerthelesse propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with Leues made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: for asmuch as it was noysed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogance, which in following ages, grew to bee much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure, whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicill might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the suddaine from the Baleares to Genoa, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italy, than that which Aldrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that hee found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore hee was driuen to make choice of his his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories: and made the vntreay Gauls, redie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to bee employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much disaile him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, he turning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bene pleased to take notice. Onely it is laid, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iane Lacina, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gambles that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infecting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse, which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empouerished by this warre; and had already tried the vnmoyest way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might recieue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voiage, neither did he ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councels of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wilddome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe decciued: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about seuen thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the severall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canas for sailes, Axes, bedde-hookes, Hand-milles, and the like implements, fitt for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helms, &c. Spears of all kindes: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford.

Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of five and fortie dayes, he had both feld his Timber, build, and lanchd twentie Triremes, and ten Quinquemes Gallies; wherewith he transported his Armie in Sicily. In Sicily hee found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Canna: which were olde Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauy censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus and Lauius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong places: in which regard, they were like to be of good vse to him in Africke, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie young men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilst he was prouiding, to haue things in a readines for Africke, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being takē prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, & rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surpris'd. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garriso, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townesmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out, whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garriso to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garriso: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacrilege: saying, that the like had neuer bene committed, without notorious reuenge by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principal the offendors, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their defects: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But olde Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. Hee laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the shurp inuictiue that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicily, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were to farre vrged, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicily, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Aduiles, who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his iourney, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lalius in Africke; rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great boorie: and strucke no little terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his iourney was, That speaking with Masaniissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africke, and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioine with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniissa his revolt from the Carthaginians; and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuius doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferior to Liuius, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe, that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuius, if it had bene true: vnlesse we should beleue, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoeuer it was, thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syrphax and Masaniissa loved. Masaniissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his sonne-in-law.

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, hee went into Spaine, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubal daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaintance her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdom. Thus farre forth we may beleue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Onely it seemes, that howsoever Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax; yet since this their countesse proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wise to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken peeces of his works remaining) Liuie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended by order of the Countrey, vnto Desales the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly dyed; and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdom, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector ouer the yonger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: Hee, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Liberties by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should haue bene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not bene guilty of the iniurie by them done vnto him, whilst his Vncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed vnluckily to stand them in any Reide. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corruall, wanted vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdom. Neuertheless Masanissa still retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though hee was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrus, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrey, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Latiue arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good successe, than could bee expected from the good will of poore Masanissa; sent an Embassage into Scil about the same time, which was little pleasing vnto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, that he could not chooseth but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein hee was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloued wifes Countrey, if it were inuaded. Neuertheless he promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardnesse of many Aduenturers. Left therefore the laying of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought the best way to prevent all discourse, and set the warre vnder taken immediately on foot. The Embassadors hee dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to consider, that what hee had promised, hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, saide hee, Masanissa hath bene with Lalius: and Syphax hath newly sent me; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I faille their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale tales prevented all further inquisition, that might else haue bene made concerning the message of these Ambassadors; whose followers had bene seene walking vp and downe Syracus. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybeum: and requesting by letters M. Pomptinus, that was Pretor in Scil, to meete him there; hastened thither with his Armie. As Lilybeum hee agreed with the Pretor, about the diuision of the Legions between them, which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twentie hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them down: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Liuie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neere to a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie; which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely asseure; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriual, helpe to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue bene the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrus, whence about was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soone after his arriual, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roused about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vially resorted, like as before hee had met with Lalius at Hippo: that was farther off; as it would haue bene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long iourney, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica, by Land; when hee might haue disembarked neerer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a coniecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrus, since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybeum, to shipe their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustentance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified vnto Lalius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Army to bee such, as not onely serued to invade the Lands of Carthage, but threatened conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might hee better aduise them to set saile for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to be leuied in haste. Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spaine by Scipio was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps hee was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction hee was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax & to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee conueighed aboard his Hulks or ships of burden, and sent them backe loaden into Sicily. He tooke likewise a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numidian horse: whose seruice beinge fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfullnesse of their Leader, that had thus houlded them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a City of great importance, * of which mention hath bene formerly made, and fate downe before it. Forty 10 dayes he spent about it, assaying it both by Land and Sea, and vsing all his engines of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuayling. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortifie his Winter Campe, which must be well stored against the yeare following. Whilst this necessity vrge him to leaue Vtica: and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to stay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gae him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neare vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse: which 20 ioyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dilodge. He chole for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men hee lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men hee bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shoare: in the bottome of the Creeke he moted his ships; and there he quartered the mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the yeare, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattaille and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great store, by driving the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corne also hee had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicily and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne, for that it was a matter of more cost. The shippes that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as he could best spare, especially with captiues to be sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neare vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the seuerer institution, which the Romans vsed in the discipline of warre, or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to illue forth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neare, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perchappes hee might be wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. 40 It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen prooffe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and beinge peraduenture no lesse weary with satiety of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene invited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while: his wife Queen Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoever it were, Syphax did onely make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africke, and so make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue 50 eare: yet beinge pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadors, he began to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the king, That the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, bins, and couered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed coverings of Matres and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carefully without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to fet their camps on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. With- 10 our helpe of some such stratageme, he fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legi- 20 ons. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter, the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discover all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many olde Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idly vp and downe the Campe, might obseure the wayes and entranes, with whatsoeuer else was needefull. When he had learned as much as he desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre, without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to 30 the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very penfuike; as hauing lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to beseege him: which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; recompencing (in conceipt) the 40 losse of their hopes past, with that of victory to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appoynted to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that he purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well, and betimes; that they 50 might be ready for the iourney. After supper, he appoynted such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Lelius and Masaniissa, whom he sent before him to set vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and 60 giue Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Lelius and Masaniissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compass about for feare of being discovered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betwene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had suten vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischance, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell vpon the enemies sword, which was ready to receiue them. Especially Masinissa, that best knew the Country, did great execution vpon them; hauing layd all the wayes, by which hee foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying onely what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out: right as Scipio would haue it. He therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest backe into their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but thrust onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue iudged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue bene sayd, that with lesse than one halfe of thirty thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had hee not bene only carefull how to save his owne fearefull head. Neuertheless Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue bene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striven to shew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to beholde the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their fearefull wayes of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the darke: but they were not many, as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs haue bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away, and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Lucius, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting vp the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; forty thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and about sixe thousand to haue bin taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of foure score and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next towne that was very strongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He hid with him no more than two thousand foote, & five hundred horse: which hee thought sufficient to defend the Towne, if the Towne-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeelde. Vnto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrivall of Scipio would soone giue an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; hee thrunk away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the towne, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preferred it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adioyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; wh'n, in stead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastie prouision for the future: but how to do it, few of them saw any means. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio; others, to send for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, leuying in all haste an other Armie; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was employed to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonuba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax, who hauing gathered together as many as he could of his subiects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne kingdome. Sophonuba laboured so with her husband, that at length she wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, wages by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africke. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they vied, were not to be resisted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleued these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole country of Spain had bene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales pleased much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lie, saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made vp an Armie, consisting wel neare of thirtie thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called The Great Fields, about five dayes iourney from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leaving behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, hauing 30 the Italian horse in the right wing; and Masinissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing, Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the vntayned followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Masinissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen vntill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were th'is come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserv'd of them, than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the mastery of the field, rooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolved vpon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masinissa, with his Numidians, and Lalius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdom, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice, it seemes that Masinissa gaue: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne kingdome, whirp'd by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse 30 concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lalius was sent away with Masinissa: and Scipio staid behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subiects of Carthage wauer'd in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vntayned burdens, which their proud Masters had layd vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was th'ir Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subiects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuertheless: of their owne free will were likely to giue little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy; yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Ambassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countiees. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: vpon the safety whereof they laid all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnitie among themselves, they might well eno^{ugh} subtilly, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not reiected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless, it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre, without any aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediately come ouer into Africke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appoynted therunto, forthwith to embarque themselves for Italy.

In this their expedition Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible peece adioyning, he easily tooke, the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neare. But whilst he was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the City, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: Vt hat this meant, he readily conceived, and stood in great feare, lest his owne shippes, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily laden with engines of battery, and wholly disposd in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall purpose. Wherefore he hasted away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should haue come too late. Neither could he indeed haue bene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried a while to make a brauado; presenting themselves in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue pur forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserue his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea; it should little auail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his shippes of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge ouer the Channell of the Hauens; whereon he placed a thousand of his choise men, with store of Darts, and other killing weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and backe againe vpon any aduantage or need: but these he couered with planks, vning the masts and yards of his shippes in stead of rafters, to ioyn them all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauens. The fight betweene them and the Romans that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For th y that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their gallies, that were lower and vnsteady, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduenturing forth from behind the Bridge, were greatly ouerborne by the force of the gillies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. Th y that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as befores for feare of hurting the friends, that were intangled & mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw vpon the masts & yards which served as arches to ioyn the bridge together: then rowing

ing backward, they tore all asunder, in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or delected. The Defendants had no other way, than to fauce themselves as hastily as they could, by thrusting into the next ranke of shippes, that lay behinde them vtouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away fixe shippes of burden, and towed them out of the Hauens, returned home to Carthage. Their well-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grievous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Lalius and Masinissa, in their iourney against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masinissa to his kingdome, without farther contention: the Masseili, his subjects, joyfully receiuing him, and forsaking the vsurpers. But here they layed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore, being solicited by Ardubal and Sophoniba, he prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masseili would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masinissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, be the title vnto some part neuer to vnish. Hercanto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the gubrage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beloued the Kingdome of the Masseili to be part of his entrailles: Lalius and Masinissa will shortly giue him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had bene conuerted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masinissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countiees; wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough, to translaue the kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no less an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haste: and few of them had seene warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe. so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foyle at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and threw with ouercharge Masinissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilst he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of horse; which fell to the files, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though he laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masinissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappy, that hee was cast from his horse, which receiued a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Roman hand. Masinissa told Lalius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe city of the kingdome, whither he himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax, along with him. Hereunto Lalius agreed. Masaniſſa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he preyayled so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one strove to get his share, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Quene Sophoniba yielded herselfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that the might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masaniſſa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lalius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since shee was his wife. But Lalius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue hailed her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-intreated by Masaniſſa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax, and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masaniſſa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministering to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnprooued. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe, calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Masaniſſa was no wiser than himselfe, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masaniſſa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masaniſſa and Lalius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed; and highly commended in publike, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masaniſſa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophoniba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had title to her bed, and that she was a mischievous nemy of theirs. Wherefore he entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to delect the memory of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masaniſſa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom he neuertheless entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophoniba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called vnto him a servant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vse then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue): and tempering a potion for Sophoniba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserue her from falling alieue into the hands of the Romans, willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, she onely sayd; That if her husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funerall. And herewithall she boldly dranke off the poyson. Thus Lalius reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the precontract betwene Masaniſſa and Sophoniba. He sayth, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lalius and Masaniſſa vpon their way thither, yielding vp their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophoniba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masaniſſa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophoniba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masaniſſa at his returne; and challengd her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masaniſſa sayd, she was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masaniſſa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her, wherein he should haue no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masaniſſa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyson, wherewith she ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So he shewed vnto the Romans her dead body, which he royally intred. The sudden violence of Masaniſſa his loue, and the ready consent of Sophoniba to marry with him: adde not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which Linie notes) of the sudden falling out betwene him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great seruice. Howfocuer it were, Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholy should leade him to some inconuenience. Hauing therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeede the ready way to diuert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beggan to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaime a king. Which honour though Masaniſſa well deserved: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefite; neither should he haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recovered possession of his Country, together with the greatest part of Syphax his dominions. It seemeth not vnlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his troupe of horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subiects, without other help; when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his kingdome, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masaniſsi were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noyed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the sonne of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speake more) which held some peece of his fathers kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserue their loue, requested that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suite: yet the Roman Senate was punitious herein, and answered very grauely. That it was not their custom to giue the honour of that appellation, saue onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proceesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefite vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce, and breake it.

The Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallne their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masaniſsa their immortall enemy, had got possession of his kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians

nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the citie, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themselves on the ground, but kissed the feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to haue vnwillfully broken the Peace betwene them and Rome; and to haue deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, where to all men are subiect, they would shew mercy vnto the City of Carthage; and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be ouerthrowne. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appoyntment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appeares, that these Embassadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans, in their owne necessity; vnlesse they themselves had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio or to his assistants, in what poore case the city of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case; as the Romans themselves had very lately bene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walles of Carthage, though Vtica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and tolde them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegades and fugitive slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaulle: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betwene Italie and Africke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, saue twentie; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had approued them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the warre had bene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lalius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long-endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an holy day appoynted for thankesgiuing and supplication to their gods. Lalius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefices done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Nimidiens, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome; that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by so rendering them to liberty, should doe an acte very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not backward with Masaniissa in complement: but shewing themselves to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should doe for him, they called him King againe; released his Nimidiens that were captiues; and sent him two purple Cuffs, that had each of them one gold button, with such other Presents, as in time of their povertie might serue to testify their good will. Scarcely were these and Lalius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arrived to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lalius being sent for, came backe from Offia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona, that stood in the Suburbs. The crand of these Embassadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to winne time, and get respite for warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chase the Romans out of Africke, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terrour of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betwene them and Lulitius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since bene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum; and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League beforepoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a jest of a warre, that had bene so terrible: Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lulitius, and other passages following betwene the two Cities. But they excused themselves by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time, vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lalius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without success. This notwithstanding, wee finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiving aduertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed betwene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approued the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence to enuoy, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason be beleued, since it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must run vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battell betwene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be averse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicill, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken by foule weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrecke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them; saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger urged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than mere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be meddling in vproores; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleet was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather up the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recovered the station where to their campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage, which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not onely for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieved; but for that by this breach of Truce, before saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the warre, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the injury done; and to deterre them from entreating any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, & kissed our feet

after an vn-usuall manner of humilitie, confefling your felues to haue perfidiously broken the League that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels: should so foone forget what ye then uttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your felues worthy to be destroyed, hauing onely recourfe vnto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that ye should consider, how long hee hath bin pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stirre: so that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Affricke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall; remembering that he is a man, and not inuincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? What gods will ye either sweare by, to be belceued, or call vpon in your misery? What words, or lamentable gesture will ye henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely ye haue already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselves vpbraided with the base demeanor of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearsal of that point which was yielded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great; or by the very reverence, due vnto the place of those that had uttered such libellous words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two gallies appointed for their safe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage, towards Pitecia. He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, willed them a good voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safety, since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no looner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipped away, and made him ouer-shoot him selfe. Yet hee gaue them chase; and had well nere surpised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shoare ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to runne their vessell aground: whereby they saved their owne liues, though a great part of their company were slaine, or hurt. This practise of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonorable attempt; by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not bene giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Affricke, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded himselfe, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

What sort Hannibal spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italie. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italie. How the Romanes were diuersly affected by Hannibals departure.

Ver since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Linius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought wortheie of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Serullius Capius, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Affricke, wherein they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happy conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Icturians, and found them ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Countrey strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Affricke, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romanes to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Icturians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe wortheie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull, in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victorie should haue bene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auailable against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shoure of darts, and killed foure of them, causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy, that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which hee had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retraite, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length hee received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne

men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided every one for him selfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about fivethousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions, also besides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. How euer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Asago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time: Hannibal received the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilest the Embassadours were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yett a plaine dealing. For, said He; They thus now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to manage the Warre heere. Scipio therfore shall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein he embarked, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he slew, not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuary vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, then men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countreies to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not led his Armie from Canna, hote and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the Walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue bene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouerthither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holliday was appointed for thankgiuing vnto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for ioy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had bene troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his owne Countie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the war from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. Wherefore the Saguntine Embassadours brought vnto them a great masse of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had bene borrowed in time of more necessitie from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the seuerer chastisement, laid vpon those 12 Colonies, that for want either of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had bene wont to giue for the Romans, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the want most of their abilities. So content were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yett considerable, the greatness of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the battell at Canna, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had bene few daies since discharged, was landed in Africk; they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads; and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would be seede a true Prophet. For bekinning themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no speciality of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of. Generall, followed by, other manner of men, than were eyther of those two. The Numidian King had bene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-sculions, that were good for nothing being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiers. Likewise Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoiles, not onely of good souldiers, but of braue Captaine, by them slaine. Such talke vied the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had been first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Romane Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Armie, as good as euer had serued in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vaine; loseth a battell at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercure, and somewhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to hind, as hee did, somewhat sure from the Enemy; that hee might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In Land Countreie, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horse of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should be easie for Masaniissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that vied it, prevailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Mezetellus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masaniissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduocate to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obediencce to Masaniissa. This Vermina as we finde in Liuius, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than to many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had bene so base as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they beought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, them, appeared greater than indeed they were: they cried they out earnestly that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see the end of these troubles, either good or bad; and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces; Hee thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuertheless, to give them satisfaction; Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence done to his Embassadors: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africa, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee lent vnto Masaniissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out, praying him to come away with speed; and lay all other business aside. Tenne Romane Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masaniissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would but little auail him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africa. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the sake of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixe thousand Foot, he made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lalius and Eulinius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and understood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such torious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Belius one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrey, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; & commanded Nabius to vie them with all possible courtesie, & send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; & caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great victorie) far less honourable then the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts; that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no pece of crueltie; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengful mindes, for the iniuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trusting them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoeuer they desired. This done, He gaue them leaue to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference, and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in place conuenient. The next day Masaniissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remooued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neere vnto which he sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a way that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence hee sent word vnto the Carthaginians, That the time and place did fully serue, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemy: where he encamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driven to take much paines, in fetching their water some what farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generalls, came with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well searched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betwene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had bene better both for Carthage and Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africa & of Italy; for that the Countreies of Sicily and of Spain, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had bene lost, and of so much blood as had bene shedde, in making those costly purchases; But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had bene expoled, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length; to make an end of their obliuate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition Hee affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared; that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said hee) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my victorie at Cannae, wonne the greatest part of Italy: and denied with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand heere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes inconstabilitie. I haue fought with thy father, Scipio: Hee was the first of the Romane Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I should haue such business, as not at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof I see hath many. And thou maist haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knows how soone? Thinke vpon M. Atilius. If he would haue hearkened vnto such persuasions, as I now vse to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, and whatsoeuer Islands else are situate betwene Italy and Africa, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans; to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully obserue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazard thou must vndergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but vntill to morrow night; and thou maist take such fortune, as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele wee shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more ado, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours deals fraudulently of late in the like Treatise: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the Warre by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answere, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicily and in Spain, which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre; but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes, which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most iust. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or over-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plain, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene proponed, whilst as yet we detained some part of Italie, they might peraduenture not have beene reieced: But as the safe now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians haue yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they haue done me since, haue made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldest be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they 10 are by thy meanes eased. Only thou must thinke, that in like sort it concerns me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauer by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to foregoe vnto us ransom-free, all prisoners that they haue of ours, to pay vs five thousand Talents; to deliver up their Gallies; and to deliver hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoyling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answer to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selues, for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the field: a notable match, and such as hath very seldom beene found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custom of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Hastati, as was viall, might fall be- 30 twene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilst there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, hee gaue direction, that when they found themselves to be over-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their sight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; there, 40 by leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to saue themselves on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battalions, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horse hee placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masaniissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their coming into Africke. He tolde them, that if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victory in this warre, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whether they would die. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: vntill they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercifull Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take 50 resolution answerable hereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than foure score, in Front

Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Balears and Adiores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More then the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those brave Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Italus, in his owne right wing hee bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masaniissa. He was indeede farre too weeke for the Enemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Mazarullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the 4. thousand of Masaniissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leued in the halfe of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foot, setting better men in their saddles. All that hee could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteen thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the aduantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since 10 the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must bee faine to comfort himselfe with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers, whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their feuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannae. He willed them to remember, That it was once P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had fift of all compelled to runne away. 30 He tolde them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Romane Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battalions, could no longer bee trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrey. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continual feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore hee entreated these his olde companions, vpon whose euer he meant wholly to repose himselfe; that they would this day strue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations vied the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew nere together, the Numidian Horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romanes. Of these Elephants (as they were alwaies an vncertaine kind of helpe) those that stood nere vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-ally themselves, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Romane Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed: but ranne backe vpon the right point of 50 their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lelius the same aduantage, that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which hee vied in like sort. In the meane while, the battalions of foote aduanced, and drew nere together with a flow and watery pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romane discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a litle, that the battell 60 of the Principes, following somewhat neerer after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themselves ready, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries receiued no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leiue Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers giue backe, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to thinke themselves betrayed: whereupon they enclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaille was herewith more terrified then before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chafed by the Romans, and betrayed, as 10 they thought, by their owne fellows, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beauen downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Romans and Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng; had their hands full of worke, that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beate this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another, could neither fight, nor easily flie. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to 10 ped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Run-awaies. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaille, and saue themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was covered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet enire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured 10 to receiue a notable overthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposit to the maine battaille of the Hannibals. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triary: He placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Corners. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer hee had beene receiued in his life before. All the daies worke till now, seemed to haue beene a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also faine the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fressh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chofe to die on the ground, whereon hee stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masani and Lalius from pursuit of the Enemies Horfe, is said to haue beene most hap- 40 pie and in needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hannibals in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by mere violence, compelled them too fall Rout.

In this Battaille there died of the Romans fiftene hundred and vpwads: on the Carthaginian side, about twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Capitaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polibius; and was acknowledged, as Liuius reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horfe: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaille with such disadvantage, hee could worke no maruels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horfe; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage, from which he had bene absent fixe and thirtie yeeres. At his coming into the Senate He said plainly That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolved to lend Embassadours againe; and try the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. 10 this

this Fleet, and that which he had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to certifye the Cite; than with any hope to take it. His Legions hee committed vnto Cn. Octavius, whom hee willed to meete him there by land. Then sending Lalius away to Rome with newes of the victory, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by tenne Embassadours from the Cite: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittill gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Cite: and viewing it more in brauery, than with meaning to attempt it, He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Octavius 10 thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journey thither, they heard the newes, that Vermine the sonne of Syphax, was coming with an Armie of more Horfe then Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermine seemed to haue bene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horfe, was sent against him: which did not onely beate him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leaving fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bene with Hannibal at Nasagara, they should haue bene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; 10 to which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horfe. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access vnto the former, yet seemed wel to dimitt the Carthaginians, & imprint in the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behaviour though it was more pittifull than it had bin before, yet procured it selfe commiseration, by reason of their late fallle dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nauertlesse it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to besiege the mightie Cite of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his landes; and giuen to 10 one of the Consuls. Cn. Serulius Capius, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as hee departed out of Italie: was bold to passe out into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Serulius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet hee needed would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, that he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authority. But ere He could haue his Fleet and all things in a readines for the journey, where- 10 no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea withoule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consullship expired, and so hee returned home a private man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now ended at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Prouince, that he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much adoore there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more 10 pious answer vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deferred: and in regard thereof to thinke themselves well dealt withall, in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Governour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection, leaving also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediately they should deliuer vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make 10

no warre as all thence forth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatsoeuer, belonging any wife vnto Masanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored vnto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay tenne thousand Talents of Silver, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choofe, being none of them vnder fouretee yeares of age, nor aboue thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them vnto the Citie. They were very vnpleasing, and therefore one Gisco stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done other while than the customes of the City would allow; forasmuch as he had bene thence absent euer since he was a Boy of nine yeares olde, vntill he was now a man of iue and forie. 20 Having thus excused himselfe of the disorder, hee discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves; had the demands of the Enemy bene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they resolved to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand siue and twenty thousand pounds weight of silver, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three monthes; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniuncti.on, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisle any Embassadours to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what 30 their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries wherinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsailes. Afdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related vnto the Senate and People these ioyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedonia: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame vpon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately been sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreymen, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken prisoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsaile, and very inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried monney with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre he sought, and and warre he should finde, if he proceeded as he had begunne. For in two maine points hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romans: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrells with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countreies, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entered into the Senate: and Afdrubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee 10 liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romanes side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie; that had bene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romanes, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproofe of Peritric, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had bene such as the Romanes was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Afdrubal made answer; Euen by the same gods, that are so seuerer vnto those that violate their Leagues.

Least vnto the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindered the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby hee was like to lose the honour, which hee purposed to get by making warre in Africk. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with 30 the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visite their Countreymen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom and carrie home with them some, that were their especial friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would choofe, should be sent our into Africk, and bee freely restored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation: The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romanes than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romanes he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasure could haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the summe therewas piteous lamentation, as if now the Romanes yoke had begunne to pinch them; for as many, euen of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when he was checked by Afdrubal Hannibal tolde, That it worst of all becomed him to laugh, since he had bene the cause why all other did weepe; He answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometime from extreme indignation. Yes, said He, My laughter is more reasonable, and lesse absurd, than your weepes. For ye should haue wept, when ye sawe due vp your shippes and Elephants, and when ye bound your owne hands from the use of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romanes first obtained. This miserable condition keepe vs winter; and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purfes, ye haue thereof thereof some sense. God grants that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your miserie, for which ye haue shed these teares. Thus discouered Hannibal vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this grieuous disease, accused that Physicion, whose noble endeauours had bene employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Masinissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderfetched. To him also hee consigned ouer those Towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, he gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not wel how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deseruings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lilybaeum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His iourney through Italie was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as hee passed along. Hee entred the Citie in Triumph: neither was there cuer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether hee were dead a while before, it cannot bee affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mightie Princes; by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, whereof the Romans had bene in a manner without hope that euery they should yet Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and tilled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Prouince which hee had subdued. This honorable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing, as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath bene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbound; the workes of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in these euents, it seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, whence it is to wonder if wee finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of the world

obnoxious vnto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of fundrie men are ouer-ruled, in manning the affaires of our daily life. It may be obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the Kingdome of Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threecore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subiect within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such number of men, as might haue seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home againe, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiers, had vnderaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue bene farre different. Yet would it then haue bene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auailable to victorie, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the olde Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Asse. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-understanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noyse, aduerture to prouoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their owne glorie should be soyld by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Euilmerodach, had stumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirat hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souldior then any other Greekish King, when he entred into warre against the Romans. This war he vnderooke as it were for his mides sake: hauing received no iniurie, but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that seru'd vnder him, to preuaile so easily against the barbarous Romanes, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicily and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be richer mettall, than wast the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirat (his Elephants and whatsoeuer else had seru'd to make him terrible) serue only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. For since they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compass of 12. yecres a Macedonian King of late memory had won: Certainly there was herunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by some good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punicke warre was ended, which followed soone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should bee on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skillfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the same time cruel Warre vpon the Greekes: so waiting their Country, and sacking their Townes, onely because they were vnable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romanes were desirous to enter, the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to bee desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for loue of Greece they had vnderaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreased verry hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them, being now the subiect of our storie, it is meet that wee should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdoms. This hapned from the third yere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Selenus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolomie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, receiued the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greeks; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedemon, &c. the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found meane to make himselfe King over the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebll vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second & third yeeres of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependents. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue bene to the Spartans; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Atolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Atolians were no more to be idle, nor were much addicted to any other Art than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, & (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the only good friends which so they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vniust: whereby with greater ease they made spoyle of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Atolians passing without leave through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could hardly abide these Atolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries, wherewith most ingratulity they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. Hee was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay a few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prator of the Achaens for the yere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath bene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a part of the Countrie, wherein he might very easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne agayne. As for the Achaens, they got hereby only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Atolians inuaded Peloponnesus agayne, hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. So There ioyned with them, in this their second inuasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of war vnto the coast of Greece: made bold to see aduentures agayne, and did great mischief. Demetrius Phariur, a creature of the Illyrians, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, hauing gotten what they could else where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Atolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater haucke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when hee came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy reuenge: there were that vrged to haue some grievous punishment layd vpon the Lacedemonians: who were thought vnder hand to haue fauoured the Atolians, in meere despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had bene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they flew such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeare in them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from coming to them with an Army: since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuil discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did mis-vnderstand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Baotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Atolians: and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Atolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some conuenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whether it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day. But when the Atolians vnderstood this for certaintie, they adiourned the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, saue in the great Parliament of all Atolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open war was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopus to be their Prator, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where hee prepared busily for the warre against the yere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Atolian side, forasmuch as the Atolians had couened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, & Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre vnto the Atolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they receiued diuerse answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Atolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger, sayd, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithful meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood vpon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was vndertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Towne which the Atolians held vpon their borders; and sayd, that they durst not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians, the chiefe of them studied onely, how to mannage the treason, for which their City had bene so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together continued subiect against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt to reigne ouer them agayne, and maintayne, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Epibori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them: And hence they referred all their counsailes: being perhaps a little moued with respect of the benefite, which might redound one Ship; that was newly chafed out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dofon, in the warres of Cleoments: to take returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose Counsaillor he was euer after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Atolians rested not. They aunged themselves vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Atolia, they required to with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dolona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill a nother yeere was laid aside: Philip stole a iourne into Peloponnesus, with five thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as he was within Corinth; Hee commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried forth of his arriual. Hee sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achaens Souldiers readie to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrey, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeede they had little cause to feare: since the Achaens themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Atolians, and their fellowes, were by him surpris'd, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation and likewise he purchas'd both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. He won Psophis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Atolians then held. Hee wonne it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preferred by the King from sacke; and giuen to the Achaens, of his owne mere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very feare; hearing how easily he had taken Psophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achaens. The like liberality he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell hee vpon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three daies; Hee proceeded on to the spoyle of those, that had taken pleasure to liue with the Atolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise deserting neighbours. Great abundance of Cattle hee rooke, with great numbers of slaves, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich villages. Then fell hee in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrey-people were fledde. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourney, by sending Embassadors to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their sadours, tooke courage to set themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neere; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Atolian Captaines, because they distrustd their ability to hold them. So the King wonne more Townes in the Countrey, than the sharpnesse of Winter would suffer him to stay there daies. For he would haue fought with the Atolians; but they made such haste from him, that he could not ouertake them, till they had couered themselves with the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue bene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then remooued to Argos, where hee spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arriual in Peloponnesus, the Lacedamonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of sparta, than that which hee could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those ialousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to haue beet right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common wealth. Hee wonne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiving the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto pradiisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst hee was vsing his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabouts they went, and shifted presently away. So he liued afterwards among the Achaens a banished man, and hated of his owne people. As for Lycurgus, hee returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to driue out his fellow-King Yong Agisipolis; where by hee made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to bee suspected, in such sort as once he should haue bene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue bene defended; yet rather than to adventure himselfe into judgement, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Atolians. His well-knownne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe; not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that hee chased Agisipolis out of the Citie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserued. Whatsoeuer he was toward some private Citizens: in the warre against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countreys good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsaillors: who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were iustly punished. Hee inuadeth the Atolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

Whilest the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied to diligently for their owne greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Dofon had left vnto Philip such Counsaillors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that hee should doe a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if hee could reduce the Achaens vnto the same degree of subiection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe during the late Expedition he had caus'd some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaens out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, Hee was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to helpe their fellowes, then hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vnjust that pleased the King. But these Achaens were tenderly sensible in matters of libertie: whereof if they could haue bene contented to suffer any little little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves vnto olde Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty, than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begonne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought to well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the filth had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achaens there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especial friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, he must be faine to deale precisely with the Achaens; and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achaens, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conforme themselves vnto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Argium, where the Achaens were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue him needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles's new fauourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patrium and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yielded it vp for feare, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymians, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vnderooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forreine inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before out of haste to beleue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutual diffidence betweene them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was sayd) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsaillor, thereby tooke occasion to suppliant Aratus. He sayd that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he sayd it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out: For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Aratus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie, deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when hee had said all he rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word, He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches, it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens; and therein having made it knowne what yeare, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your felices. Old Aratus grauely admonished the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yes, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delayed to bring in the prooff, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and tolde what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati: which when he found no better than a mere device against his honourable friends; He entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The vnrestfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar; he had prepared a snare for the Arati, so faying of them, he thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip, Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targuettiers, and Megalas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to be at Apelles's disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their rooms. Against Alexander hee went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumination and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he vfed more finess, loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art hee thought to haue remoued him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe, and fought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; Hee was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore agreat deale of time was lost, whilest Philip wanted both the money and the Corne, wherewith hee should haue bene furnished by the Achaens. This made the King vnderstand his owne errour, which he wilily sought to reforme betimes. Hee perswaded the Achaens to reioiune their Parliament from Argium, to Sycion the Towne of Aratus. There hee dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past, and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth hee intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Achaens. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as hee himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, hee should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, hee began to prouide shipping, that so he might inuade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians; that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe, euen by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entered into conspiracy with Demetrius and Megalas: binding himselfe and them by Oath to crosse and bring Aetolians had sped ill that yeare: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeares following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had bene grievously afflicted, as before was shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedaemonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should bee able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those mileries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace: without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Aetolians readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the king, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalas thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sort to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incited against many of the kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noyle, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiers themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalas were afraide, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repayre vnto Corinth, where hee might stand betwene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while bene wanting to the businesse, vnderaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was growne so into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves vnto him, and received from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that money, and all things needfull for the publike seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would giue assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iourney from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the city of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megalas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride and had vehement suspicion of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tel him, that he should wait a while, or come another time; for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megalas to look to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it wereto do some piece of seruice, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, hee might not be called called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megalas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hastie than else he would haue bene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megalas were intercepted, which hee wrote vnto the Aetolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen ready to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pueritie. By this the King vnderstood more perfectly the falshood; not onely of Megalas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalas who was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megalas also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flic, was weary of his owne life, and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Aetolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Arastus, wrought very effectually toward their ouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megalas, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning & continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeare following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified hee his Macedonian souldiours, by yielding to let them winter in their owne Countrey. In his returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Aetolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus provided for safety of his owne; the Aetolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Aegypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former sollicitation about the Peace. This fashion had bene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrey at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to binde vnto them those people, that were howeouer weak in numbers, yet very good souldiours. But heereby it came to passe, that the more froward fort, especially the Aetolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falshood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being so well assured, that if they had the worst, The lone of Greece would be sufficient for to redeme their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achaens, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly then before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer vnto the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Aetolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first bee dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Thrasymene. These letters hee communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him, to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Heereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Aetolians; which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Napactus. There did Agelaus an Aetolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie.

Such aduice could the Aetolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being loone after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their owne good counsell, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Countrie, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrie) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene Hannibal and Philip.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which he ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath bene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise bene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Aetolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue bene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely heere set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the some it selfe then vsed; though it had bene ouer-long to haue bene inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Couenants betweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the sonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the sonne of Demetrius hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Iupiter, and Iuno, and Apollon: before the God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolans, before Mars, Triptolene, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Earth; before Rivers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betweene You and Vs, that this Oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, vpon Couenants, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Princes of the Carthaginians using the same Lawes, and of the Vitians as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendship in Italy, Gaulle, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates, be saved and preferred by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vitians, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaulle and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italy. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. with all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subletie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Hauens, with which we haue already league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which wee haue already league and friendship. The warre that we haue with the Romans, haue Te also with them, vntill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Tee shall aid Vs with those things whereof we haue need, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vs You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, Wee shall make friendship in such wise that Tee shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corcyraans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romanes Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make warre vpon Te or Vs; Wee will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue need. The same shall be obserued in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold already league and friendship. To this league if we or Te shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

6. IIII.

How Philip yielded to his naturall vices being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick warre. He possioneth Aratus: and growes hateful to the Achaeans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, hee might have offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatness of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrey. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly governed him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listning to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serve his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before hee should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boylike-our Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely see to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betwene the Nobilitie and Commones: their vehement thoughts being rather directed (as happens often after a forcin warre) vnto domesticall objects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proceesse of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth true any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his coming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore hee consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnrulie Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his fallshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more then was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. Hee ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice hee did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Carinith, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Countrey. Whilst hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrailles of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a litle; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a Southsayer, thou maist goe thy waies, and let slip this good aduantage; If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all at was left vnto him by Antigon, which was his credit; then were it faire better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against him, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yielded at the present: but nor without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene him and the Arats; whom he thought more froward than becomed them in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as hee plainly discovered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise hee perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had beene dishonest with his sonnes wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might report, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countreiman, and a temperate Prince, hee had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journey hee found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That vnholist counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But Hee would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, He seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of serling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which hee could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilst hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue fought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In mannaging wherof though Philip did the offices of a good Capitaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. Hee had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourney into their Countrey, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not halty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force, and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open Warre. But in that warre hee could do little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprize. In this attempt vpon Messene hee lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailler and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee poisoned olde Aratus; and shortly after that he poisoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue beene knowne, because they were done secretly; and the poisoners themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto

to remember the League that ye have made with me, and so keep in; If ye doe otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So hee dismissed the Embassadors; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euerie one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a searfull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouernors and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whilst they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Heereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Alydens three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in qualitie and estate.

THis calamitie of the Alydens, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeede it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interested in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five months, but in the short space of five daies saying. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip, which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africke; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastened away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must bee acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to them, though stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greece Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an vttrise suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarmanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. Hee failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the Riuer of Apus, betwene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craved his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilst hee was farre from them. They be moaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them.

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeede besieged: onely some Ro- uers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Euboea, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoyle their fields; because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preferred them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had bene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicily, to make warre vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had bene still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Euboea, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Countrey about: and makes a iourney into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achaens. Hee returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and prouides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Atolians into the warre.

P*Philip*, returning home from Alydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainment, or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne employment better. He grew loone weary of sitting as a Scare-crowe, to saue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Townes men, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Heereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, sayled thither by night, for feare of being descryed: and arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. Hee vied no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue let the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouisions for Warre, which were plentifully filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their shippes, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statuaes to him there erected. This done, they halted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him; though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leaving at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descryed him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a trumpet out of their Cittadell to sound the Alarme; and with all speede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeng the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius was not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of hastie yet hauing in the Towne some mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight hee gaue singular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heate of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But hee retired without harme taking; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which hee spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Agina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to preuent him of latisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achaens held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achaens were deuising vpon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon: who being flattered vp in the roome of Machinidas, did greater mischief then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercenaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedie extorcioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one that in his natural condition sanct rankle of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apege was very fittly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoyling the men, than hers in fleeing their wiuers; whom shee would neuer suffer to bee at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee could an Image to be made liuely representing her; and appaelled it with such costly garments as shee vied to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, seruing to torment men. Heereof hee made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose mony he was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apege stood, and there vse all his Art of perswasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses, then tooke hee the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apege (who sate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee ledde him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was also sticking in the breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith shee griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Government. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Atolians, as Machinidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romanes; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former war. Of Philopemens vertue he stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achaens, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farr worse Capitaine, was their Prator; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopemens being also gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and waisting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safety in the Townes.

Against

Liv. lib. 31.

Exemptio p. 15. lib. 31.

Against this Tyrant the Achaens were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilst he made warre vpon Lacedemon, He ought not to keue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect hee thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Ile of Euboea; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romanes: Wherefore their Prator Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, He had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achaens. Neuertheless, he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had beene doing what him hee might vnto the Countie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Fleusine, the Haven of Pyreus, and euen the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euery of these places; that he could no more then wreake his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So He destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, having long agoe bene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe; but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vnseruicable to their repARATION. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, He went home into Maedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consil that lay about Apollonia, and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Atolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consil encamped vpon the river of Apfus. Thence hee sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke sundry Castles and Townes; vsing such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which hee wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consil with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian capitaine: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their campe. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaides the Thyrian; Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance vnto the Consil, who thanked them: and sayd, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betwene the Atolians and Thessalies, might be perhaps auailable with the Atolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Atolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Romanes, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and sayd: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his Master and the Atolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made them, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to the defence of the Atolians, and yet notwithstanding had bene angry, that the Atolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they lent their helpe to the Amazones; and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleaged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Atolians: who if they drew such Masters into Greece, in like sort it would becom to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and lend them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were let on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian to imballadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few daies past, with Philip vpon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Heerewithall they made a pittifull rehearsal of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Attica, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athen selfe, together with Minerva, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the walls and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They sayd, that they had of late made Warre in the Atolians behalfe; and that the Atolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Atolians must excuse themselves, by alleaging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aide conuenient: for this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the Atolians to take part with them in their War and victorie, vntill they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the warre by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cause, why Dorymachus the Atolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Countrymen, That by reseruing themselves, until the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That our much hate was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, Hee passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwhile it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Atolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Atolians. Hee thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the *Dardani*ans;

*Dardani*ans; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleue, that hee was not weakly attended. And this may haue bene the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Attica by his father, whom earnest businesse called thence in another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heracles, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romanes, from doing harme by sea; when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Countrey of the Desfaretz, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candania; that running along from Hemus in the North vntill they ioyned in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaine them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse vnwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein hee bestowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines to prouoke out the Romans to fight, instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectfully; as opportunitee should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so boldly, that they draue him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the woike, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore presented the second time, leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about fourecore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had neuer seene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so neere the Enemie, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in come out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight myles off: presuming that Philip would not aduenture to meete him on open ground; and so the more boldly hee suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them careless. When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betwene the Forragers and their Campe. There hee stayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the passages, that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there elapsed some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it nee: full: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disauantage; as comming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue bene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an haruelt, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Romane Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse too make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to look to their owne safety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldom heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marilhes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee bene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted, mounted him vpon his owne horse, and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improuident rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dullnesse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were walled, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnlkely, That if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that noble Historian, Liuie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Arme lay fast in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage therinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Strights. This was it which made him aduerture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleare himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them awhart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruicable in that case. But they were few, and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman fields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Arme; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whilst he himselfe went against the Aetolians. For Damocritus the Prator of the Aetolians, who had referred himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had bene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time; and so, not staying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Asiamanian; and made inuasion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and crucially sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay disperfed, was like to haue taken their Camp; if Aminander, more warie then the Aetolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time; the Roman Fleete, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Ilands in the Aegean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Eubaea; and some other places therabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly bene made with the Aetolians: so the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gauls in Italie. An Embassye of the Romans to Carthage, Masaniissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ranne away; and P. Villius a new Consul, tooke charge of the war in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiours: whereof there were two thousand; having serued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannae: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing bene long absent from Italie, which saue they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the History of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great; since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as wee find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably beleeue, that Villius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bene expected with the Gauls. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had bene able to force, was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saved her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staid behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps left the message might seme other wise to haue fauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaues belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masaniissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masaniissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending then some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing bene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemy, Hee ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masissaw would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadors, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls: they layde siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the managing of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subiects, by punishing a bad Counsaillour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendering vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thercinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, having vniuersally laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a iourney (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein hee could not bee supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and hee very shortly arrived at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Theſſalie wassidly Philip, the Romans, and Atolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip deli- uers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

He Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemy, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtile Greeke, the arte of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a litle while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, many yeeres after this, vnto priuat men, for part of those monies that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerſe from the Macedonian Warre, and had thereby dri- uen the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relye vpon their Confederats. So they leauied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident vnto the sustentance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some ieaousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Atalrus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it, or else that they would not take it vncourteouslie, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They saide, That it was not their manner to vse the ayde of their friends, longer than their friendes had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to asseorde it; That

That they could not honestly take part with Atalrus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betwene them. In such louing salition did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus, who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the kingdome of Atalrus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the sup- plying decreed vnto him, which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had serued in Spaine and Africke. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming hee presently discharged) and king Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apſus or Acum. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and beene forced to retorne backe without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Theſſalie, then should they enter into a plentiful Country, and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likely- hood. For the riuer of Apſus, running along through that valley which alone was open betwene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marsh and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocks by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; hee was compelled to sit still, without doing anything for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might be ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that hee and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the iniuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had beene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, hee thought it against all reason, that hee should relinquish his claime and dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre forth as it should appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, hee could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not bene interested in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one provoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that he named were the Theſſalians: These had beene Subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded what sharper Condition he would haue layd vpon him, had hee beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuayled against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolute what course to take: there came to him an Heardsman, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound: and being promised a great reward, in case hee made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They traueled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discouered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscouered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their iourney, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians, thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe, and assailed them in their strength. He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they beooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: hee made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, vpon equal ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retreat he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrey, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him, which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to see any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuously, that he was driuen to make such waffe of a most pleasant and fruitful Countrey, which had cuer been well affected vnto him: so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his kingdome of Macedon.

The Atolians and Athabanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to invade Thessalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, cut of their severall Countreies. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they fore-slowed not the occasion, but made all speede, each of them to lay holde vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their haruest, could not find enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded vnto him. Rhage he besieged: and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recolected his spirits, hooured about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing wel-neare spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauentowne of Phocia, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Countrey being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly liketo haue. Many Townes in Phocia he wonne by assault: many were yielded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space hee had (infect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyined with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wonne two Cities in Euboea; and afterward layd siege vnto Cenchree, an Hauentowne and Arceall of the Corinthians on their Eastern Sea. This enterprize did somewhat helpe forward the Acheans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Acheans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had bene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilst being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poisoning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people to their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to holde him as a necessary euill, even whilst they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopemen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend: then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angered him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopamen. But failing in this enterprize, and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to burne. Philopamen wrought so with the Acheans, that no discouise was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to wish draw themselves from the Macedonian. Cyclidius, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionat in the cause of Philip; and Antisthenus chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyn them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Steyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans, to ioyn with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this businesse, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadors, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Acheans to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell; who remembering the benefices of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the fence of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much alteration the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie: with the Romans (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argines, hauing don their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree; which they could not resist, any yet with honestie thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argines had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Acheans may bee better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so ill a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discouered it selfe so plainly, in the behauiour of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citiie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philopemen, a lieutnant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Atolians. Him the Conspirators drew to King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors haue truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Achaens, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaens had some right, (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alledged, euen against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Successe had bene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadors into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedaemonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens: and therefore cōced to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be assigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philotes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appoynted to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a straight alliance with the Lacedaemonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the Citizens them selues he might be called into it. Hereabout Philotes dealt with the Argiues; but found them slow to asseie; that, in open assembly of the people, they desired the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philotes, without more ado, to make ouer the Towne which hee was ready to receive. Philotes accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night, and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staid behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also a great imposition of monie was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theues, in purloining their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to ioyn with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Straights into Peloponnesus, there to meete with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some caill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans sixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Achaens, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the final conclusion of peace betwene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended, which after this continued not long.

§. XIII.

§. XIII.

The battaile at Cynosephale, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soone as hee vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre, meant afterwards wholly to relie vp on himselfe.

Titus had in his Armie about fixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie, and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, nere vnto the Citie of Phere: where the vant-courriers on both sides discouered each other, and sent word thereof vnto their severall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer hasty, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while; returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little advantage vnto either side. The Country about Phere was thicke set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue backe into Scoutia in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessities. Titus conceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it onely to waste the Country. There lay betwene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neurtherlesse they encamped not farre alinder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where hee found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouersers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worfe. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Aetolians had bene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had bene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians preuailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne; if hee could vse an occasion, the like wherof hee should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hills, which forthat the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynosephale. As soone as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his advantages: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, seruing nothing aptly for his phalanx. Neurtherlesse hee found conuenient room, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest: embattailing them as they might. Whilest he was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrink; as being faine vpon the Roman Legions, by force wherof they were driuen to recoyle. He sets forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; hauing the Romans not farre behinde them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill, Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had no leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselves aggrieved that they were vitally neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to support the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some acedonians; and well affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made among them their complaint unto Titus, saying, that they were no better then lost: for the good will which they had borne unto him, was lesse at this time, when heeely close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet neverthelesse did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoever they durst not take Armes against them, yet each of them as they found straggling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrey. This was detestable within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred siclers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with exiles; which hee would not take as good satisfaction. Hee sends Embassadors to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewithall he falls to waiving their Country, and beseegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Athenians, (especially of the Acheans who offered; if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet beforelong him rather to grant peace unto the Bœotians) prevailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonians; others greatly doubting mong them, rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonians; others greatly doubting that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have bene glad that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. That it was the purpose of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceive, that this Macedonian Warre served as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Acheans of Phthiotis, Mægnetians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendered now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-nere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greekes, was like to be much more available unto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could have bene the possession of a few Townes; yea or of all those Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof, so sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gave audience to Hagesanax and Iysias King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they would to signifie unto their Lord, That hee should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemie or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe over his Army into Europe;

adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greekes; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisdome to offend o-uermuch, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis they annexed unto the Thessalians; all save the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had bene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and reiected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthum) for that all which were partakers of the Achaean Common-wealth, enioyed their liberty in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Ilyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodiens had bene their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuenthe Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his sonne and succellour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enioy their libertie. Orestis, a little Prouince of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These busineses being dispatched: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the warre with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about unto others, to predispose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre unto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTIOCHVS the Great, and his adherents.

§. 1.

What Kings, of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemie, reigned in Asia and Ægypt before Antiochus the great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is saide) bene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath bene preferred, or any mischance auoyded, by the predictions of such Diuellish Oracles. Rather I beleue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue bene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the euent.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who surrendred vp unto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderstood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vnrerenged by this his Successor. But

than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Enmenes wonne much in Asia, whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand; and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which surname was giuen him, because he sought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether he were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Hauing fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Ariamnes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soone perceiued; and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee resolued to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what cuill hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good hee was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee layd him vp in close prison: whence, though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of theues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arfaces founder of the Parthian kingdom: where in his cuill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arfaces dealt friendly with him, and dismisst him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeres. He had to wife Laodice, the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captaines: which was father vnto that Aschius, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stiled himselfe) a king, though rather indeed a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeres in which time he made warre vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of body through sicknesse, & in want of money, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally hee was slain by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolemie Euergetes, and Philopator, Kings of Egypt. Warre betweene Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo: an Expedition of Antiochus against him. The continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian warre: with the passages betweene the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemie, and Peace concluded. Of Achus, and his rebellion; his greatnesse, and his fall. Antiochus his Expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fiftene yeres olde, when he began his reigne, which lasted sixe and thirty yeres. In his Minoritie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull seruants. This vilde qualitie in a Counsaillour of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt so died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere bene remembered. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achaens: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominions the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the Ptolemies; was giuen to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoyle doer of good, as for his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those

those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made war vpon the Arues, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meer countenellence of mony, refused to pay vnto him his yerely tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wisdom of Iosephus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Celestria, with palestina & all those parts of the Country that lay neereft vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished & slaine in the battell at Issus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucide; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned sixe and twenty yeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtieth and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides therewith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty yeres, were the yeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident so that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsaillour, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptians; for the recovery of Celestria and the Countries adioyning. This counsaile was very vnseasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion; and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Country. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained listily, that it was most expedient; and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithfull; whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenetas an Achaean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebells; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Celestria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Desert into the Vallie of Maryas, betweene the Mountains of Libanus and Anti libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Atolian, that sturued vnder Ptolemie. So hee consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenetas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenetas, whilst hee was yet on his journey, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; received many aduertisements, by such as fledde ouer vnto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Command to beare armes against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessity. Xenetas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time such as hee thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenetas could not so bee stopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether hee did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne souldiours: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemy; the great folly of Xenetas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenetas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom hee was advanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authority; without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore hee suffered his men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against th^r journey, which he intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fledde. And to the same purpose hee busied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went moneths, with promise that hee would bee ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as hee would faime haue seemed, but only to lull his enemies asleepe, whilst he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achaus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Aegyptian would haue vied, he vsed himselfe, as presuming, that when time of the yere better serued, little force would be needfull, for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse, hee gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Aegypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. Hee said, that it was agreed betwene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, should bee giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipsum. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said, that Ptolemy the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Celestria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countreys about the Riuier of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemy would needs haue Achaus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King, should offer to deale with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to ioyne him in Confederacie with his own Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemy, with a very puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Aegypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountered on the way by those Capitaines of Ptolemy, that had resisted him the yere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuerthelesse he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his journey, wonne so many places, that hee greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Capitaines of Ptolemy forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Aegyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Aegyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemy, with Arfinae his sister and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; as the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deeds of his Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to valew themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Affrike. Wherefore by the aduantage of those beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolemy had the better men; by whose valour he brake the Groffe of his Enemies battaile, and won the victory; whilst Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field about teenty thousand foot, and sixe thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse; yet the fame of his ouerthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemy and Achaus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Aegyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted, it being much against the nature of Ptolemy to vex himselfe with the tedious businesse of warre. So Ptolemy, hauing staied three moneths in Syria, with the tedious businesse of warre, returned home into Aegypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achaus was not comprised in the League betwene these two Kings: or if hee had beene been included therein; yet would on the Aegyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that hath thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus: Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Mela the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard other wise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin german to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings 10 brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemy of Aegypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelyhoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betwene his sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Aegyptian: He was not onely slothfull, but hindered by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Aegypt, of whom Ptolemy, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition, beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenary Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betwene the King and his subiects: wherein though the ill guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemy thereby vailed much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue bene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achaus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Aegyptian, 30 an, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achaus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and hindre him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had put vp Achaus into the Citie of Sardis; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so 35 there appeared not, when the second yere came, any greater likely hood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Ligras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Caste it selfe, was vp on a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne wall adioyning to the Caste, in that part which was called the Save, 40 was in like manner situate vpon deepe Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottom, wherein lay the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, veas, and sometimes of men, vied to be throwne. Now it was obscured by Lagoras that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vied to flie vp vnto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch vpon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, hee reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those Rocks, and whilst a generall assault 50 was made, entered the Towne in that part; which was at other times vnguarded, there vnto thought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardis; when Cleofus sought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke no warning, by the example of a losse thimny ages past; and therefore out of memorie, Achaus held still the Caste: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the viall tediousness of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, 60

and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth vnto them his sister Agathocles, with the young King in her armes; began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great neede was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to fet the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spak; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly bene his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus, and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moued with feare of harme; which, in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For hee was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernement, as afterwards he proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouiision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these mooues wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vpror. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparell to be tormented. But whilst the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leaving Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the dores open. He perceiuing this, naked as he was, conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Tanizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus bene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiors, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenante fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streetes; as was also his mother, withall to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing so them in peeces.

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus, who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the chilles estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to diuide betwene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan, whose Father had bene Confederate with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonians, He was very soone found busied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that He was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath bene shewed before. As for Scopas, He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Temes, who seeme to haue yeelded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynosephale, Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bene lost. Among the rest, the Temes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbear to invade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Councie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this young child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betwene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to afford him great advantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellefpont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Temes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome, yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, and delisted from that enterprise. Hauiug thus farre gratified the Romans, He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a peace & amitie betwene him and them. It is not lightly to be overpassed, that these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome, and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answere of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, notwithstanding much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit he can off the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, hee offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus; seeking each of their friendship, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; being caried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was, He sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them thre to stay for him; whilst he himselfe with a Fleece of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilst the warre of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioyne with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadors; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, left his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appeare to haue beene a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed betweene his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephale. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vntill the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had euer bene greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aide they could vnto all the subiects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the war that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: Hee excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetarus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therefore in finally preuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans; and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbor, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he tooke such order as he thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampascus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obstinately stroue to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he failed vnto the Hellepont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Asians objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thercinto a Garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his Garrison did not oppress the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such, might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming thither. For the Towne was utterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrey therabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopeful promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: hee tooke a iourne in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leaving the other halfe to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recover and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus; and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countrey, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King Antiochus. The Actonians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Achaeans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him, because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards, passe betweene them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip; and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece were become little better than Clieues vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worke, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Countailors sent from Rome, required (as hath been shewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-proffited amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Countailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, that two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnuindfull of the businesse: wherein left T. Quintius, with his ten Assitants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome on purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other private instructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, hauing bene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, he hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Countailors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesanax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof hee had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and Hee done nothing? Further He warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourne there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking

upon the matters of Asia: wherewith Hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his coming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lyfima- chia, and the recovery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countreie, He deried it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lyfimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in contiouerie betwene him and the other Kings, had bene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Agyptians; but had bene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countreies, were hindred by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lyfima- chia, since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Agypt, since it was his meaning to make the free Cities be- liegers, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolemie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of nere affinitie. Cornelius huius heard this, and being perhaps vnable to re- sistance it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lamp- sacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lamp- sacus being called in, beganne to speake; wherein they seemed to accule the King be- fore the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrup- ted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Ro- mans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betwene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, and there- by to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend onely the good- nesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iudice, forbore the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious ghosts; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Agypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the King- dome; and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Countreie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, and prepare for his Agyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Agypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Ar- mie; and left him to ouer-see the building of Lyfima- chia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadors to T. Quintus: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as hee was further proceeding on his voyage, He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him beare an- other way from Agypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lyfima- chia, (at least so wile not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good, Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire so- ciety with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes a- gaine. They who deale thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were solicited; and particularly the Aetolians. That

That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needlesse to say plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vnto the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victory ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to let foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Here to the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their grieues; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, where- with both to picke a thanks of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this ho- nourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen the man ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places du- ring life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the lues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Nei- ther did they vse this: their power with moderation; but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne; He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their im- potent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Praetor. By vertue of which Office; though he was superior vnto them during that yeere; yet had it not bene their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annual Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accountable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore tending for one of the Quæstors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quæ- stor felt lightly thereby, and would not come. For hee was of the aduersie Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Iudges: in con- templation whereof, he was filled already with the spirit of future Greatnesse. But hee had not to doe with such a true Praetor, as were they that had occupied the place be- fore. Hannibal sent for him by a Persuuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publique assembly of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vndutifull stubbornnesse of this Quæstor had bene; but how vn- sufficient the infolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbidded power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrats. To this Oration when he per- ceined that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be cho- sen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres toge- ther. If this Law had bene passed, before hee passed ouer Iberus: it would not per- haps haue bene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto necessitie of reform- ing another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leue by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needefull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Reue- nues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatocuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So hee found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrats, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vie, were thereby faine to loade the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof hee made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasurie were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Cartha- ginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts; as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Han- nibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and il- l-employed authoritie, both at once; euen when they thought themselves to haue bene in full possition of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alludge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beast, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idlenessse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, euery one to 10 the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their maleiouse purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witness against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vied their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius 20 Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controversies, betwene the Carthaginians and Masaniissa, But Hannibal had kept such good spiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed 30 Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had he a Shippe furnished with all things needefull; as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So Hee bade Africk farewell, lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina, hee found there in the Haven some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore He would 40 needes hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted couert, He made them bring thither all their failles and yards to be vsed in steed of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speede homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly construed. Some ghesed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where 50 he had bene scene: and then the Roman Embassadors, hauing none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; wherby they only discouered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that He did not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity betwene their Citie, thought themselves to haue interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed med him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly reioyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore forrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiours of base Astisques; as it had been by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiceable and skillfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people: yet was it there-withall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions where-in he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse careful to auoid the war, then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes; ynto lesse by mere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Atolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late bene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnaduised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to 30 right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romanes out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Atolians were wont to vbraide the rest of the Greeks with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliuers had layd heavier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romanes had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay in accomplishment of that which 40 was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romanes, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus, Hee made it his daily suit, That the Peace betwene him and Rome, such as it was, might bee confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuertheless T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armee were thence departed. And in this regard, Hee retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, hee might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Sure vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embassadors, that had bene sent ouer to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherein he should find not only the Atolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedaemon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilst Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intenuite to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be readie to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his 50 Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarrance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be forry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good presence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yerres before this, as is already shewed, whilst he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achaens; neither since that time had hee done any thing, whereby he should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeede a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achaens; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than only the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some part maimed, or incomplete, whilst the noble City of Argos was left in subiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duely to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to bee vndertaken; or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answer herunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as hee could deuise. Hee gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their virtues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pitie it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination to foretell, what harme the Argos Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Atolians. Wherefore Alexander the Atolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their City had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the liberty generall: from which honor they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base affliction, would leade all the rest into seruitude. Then spake He against the Achaens, Clients that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and foulders of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, He said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre bee made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Atolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwaies beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing beene alwaies wont to professe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But so they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeede be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Atolians themselves did promise, & would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yield to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Atolians; as did their owne raucous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worke would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene couenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoyle of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Atolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole assembly, especially the Achaens, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Atolian theues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Atolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had beene sent vnto him from Rome, to bee his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedamonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Romane forces, King Eumenes with a Naue, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Atolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remooued the Atolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedamonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues more bold then wise, began a conspiracie against the Lacedamonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and flaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Arme to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no fit within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedamon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof since the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Army of fifteene thousand, wherewith to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumised slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Assembly: and compassing them round in with his Arme, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves, they might, hee said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemic. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worked dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and the mildest course, to arrest beforehand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his owne person from danger, but them also for the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Heereupon hee cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leades away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noyed abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortall crime to bee suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto some some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and flaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a fallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey, hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the Rhadians, layd siege vnto Gythium, the onely or principall Towne that Nabis had. Like-ly they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouvernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other, finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, flue the Traitor, after whose death, hee himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gythium: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne in law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouvernment with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argiues: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gythium: which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Compollition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus: requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments, whereof the summe was, That whatfoeuer they now did, or could obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon hee inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alledged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatfoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from 30 entering into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie, and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Consideracie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alledged. Wherefore hee said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That hee had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentio- 40 ned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre: it may seeme to haue bene obiected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very triuolous. As for Messene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristanus, the Prator of the Achaens, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed this discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis so to consider well of his own estate, and to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazzard: alleading the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour- cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happinesse, as priuate men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in League all that

that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending, Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grieuous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedaemonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor warre, either in that land or elsewhere; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome inunctions; with imposition of an hundred talens in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fittie talens yeerely, for eight 10 yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants hee demanded fise hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice: then had it bene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, haue bene prosecuted vnto the very vtmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to entich themselves by the spoyle 10 of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the noble Achaens, who iudged it euer after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Atolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which rooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Maltreated Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedaemon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the selfe-same 30 Romans, whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But falsly had hee dealt with the Macedonian: and falsly was hee dealt with by those, to whom hee did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; saue onely that for the banished Lacedaemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Agepolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yong childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no prouision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be so contented, to liue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore hee forbore to giue consent vnto these demands: 40 and sustained an assault or two, hoping belike that the enemies would soone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had bene propounded, Hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himselfe; and was readie vpon the first aduantage, to doe them all the mischief that he could.

The Argiues had heard newes that Lacedaemon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remouee of the three 10 thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should set their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfullie welcommed. Hee was deferuently acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that he might the better entitle himselfe thereto, hee caused the libertie of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Newmaun games, as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Countie of Achaia; whereby the Achaens were not more strengthened, than the Argiues themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace & friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Atolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Atolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countie, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leauing the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romanes found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achaens; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrius; that so it might bee knowne, what liers the Atolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. Withioyfull acclamations did the Greekes testify their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ranome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leauing the Countie before his departure was vged, left therein behinde him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ielouie & suspicion of any euill meaning. At his coming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodlied of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoyles of a Countie, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romanes had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenus the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsaillors; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equal termes of aduantage; or between those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsual to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betweene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kinde, was the league & friendship that had beene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romanes. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia hee should see at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes, eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore hee propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept; Eyther that it should bee lawfull for the Romanes, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romanes might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lyfimaehia, whercon of late he had bene at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopleing it with inhabitants; that had all beene dispersed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alledged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romanes; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to see at libertie those Towns, which the King would oppresse and hold in subjection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language, and fell in regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon haue left Antiochus King of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had beene already with the King at Lyfimaehia; by whom they might receiue a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

6. V.

Of the long warres which the Romanes had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Malanilla to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romanes for iustice in vaine.

THE Insularians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians, made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were viterly subdued: which was not, before the Romanes were almost at the vey height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes,

Ch. 2, 5, 2. of this booke.

Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first preuailed, and got large possitions in Gallia Cisalpine now called Lumbarde; it hath bene long since rehearsed, betwene the first and second Punicke Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would haue bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not bene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwaies made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; 10 well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forth-well ready to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore, and had little or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Army that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gauls, 20 their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoyling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seemes to haue bin grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages. To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of iniuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betwene them and any of their neighbours, doe very commonly this answere, It hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their owne Countrie they did little harme: not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, saue on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe- 40 hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer provided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto 50 their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnted themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Chollericke Spanish humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vsed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits 5 which which they rayed vpon the whole Countrie; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwise the Romans, vsing the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latins, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spaine was too far distant, and withal too great, for them to send out Colonies thither, where-by to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwaies maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captaines, as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and to thereby held the Countrie; though seldome in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spaine against the Romans, euen vpon the same generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish Warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left beside him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with fibicell, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted yee res. This Victory of the Romans, though 20 it happily ended the Warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the Warre, which after yee res brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsul, whom they slew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither to Prætors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yere following, and sent into that Prouince, found at his coming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But he felt out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victory vpon the chieftest of 30 them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrie, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a iourne against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse; He prayed them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding 40 their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countreimen: excusing the indigntie, such as it seemed, with a iust. That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he neede to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the Warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by 50 causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Heerein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vsfull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skillfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any businesse either private or publike. Many books he wrote; whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance, being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore & fixe yeeres, He pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Vtican: one, that being of like vertue and seruencie, had all his good purposes dashed, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatness as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Romane Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spain (that was diuided into Gouvernements) did rarely faile of such worke; as might afford the honour of Triumph. One flew thirtie thousand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke fiftie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people; new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spain required not the employment of a Romane Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed; vntill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was verie long after.

In all other Countreies to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves & their obedient Citie: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Lepis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the Iudges had been vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds had left them the possession of this Country: Masaniissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise bene questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Romane Senate. Hee gaue the Father to understand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately bene sent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his shippe, had thereby afforded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee said, bene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon so much ground; as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adiuage vnto such vniuersers, the Countrey sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter to doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong Army should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from stirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their final destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leaue to expresse the utmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Aetolians labour to prouoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis beseegeth Cythereum and wasteth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopemen, in aduantage of ground: whereby hee utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans; ioyne with the Aetolians. The Aetolians surprize Demetrius, and by killing Nabis, their Confederates, seize vpon Sparta. But they are driuen out by the Citizens: who at Philopemen his perswasions annexe themselves to the Achaians.

AL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Aetolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoyle of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes, were not onely disappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonian. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnjustifiable wrong. Wherefore they desired, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, to ioyne altogether in a new Confederacy: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achaians, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Aetolians tooke in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great leaders. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with perswasions, as they thought, most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to try first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedemonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay siege vnto Cythereum, that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achaians, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neither would they haue staid long from repressing his violence by open Warre; had not some of them thought it wisdome to aske counsaile of the Romanes, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilst thus they spent time in sending Embassadours, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them insufferable cause of complaint, by waisting their owne Territories.

Philopamen was then Prætor of the Acheans, who had long been absent in Crete, making war there for his mindes sake and recreation. Vnto him the Acheans referred themselves, giuing him leave to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romanes came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gythium, by Sea; hearing lest the Towne, and the Achean Garrison within it, should be lost, if he vsed any delay. But Philopamen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeres agoe bene counted a gallant vessel, in the Nauiue of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet to good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was steeled at the first, and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and fled themselves with what speed they could. But Philopamen was not herewith daunted. If so hee had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gythium, to stoppe the Acheans if they should invade his Countrey. But vpon these, which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopamen came unexpected, fired their Camp, and put all, save a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Armie towards Lacedæmon: within ten mil: whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gythium. It was not expected that Nabis would haue bene ready for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gythium, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fise miles; hauing their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopamen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to make the situation of the Countrey about him; and to discourse, what might betfall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and fortified in such manner, and marching towards such a place, he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meet for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best do it? in what fort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what fort encamp himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continual meditation, hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, hee encamped nere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, withall thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke, whereto the Acheans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopamen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; wherinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitiue; and tell him, that the Acheans had a purpose to get betwene him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recovery of their freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue bene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to stay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philomen was not so to be beguiled. He easily wonne the Campe, and gaue chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in covert all that day; Philopamen conceiued aright, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and save themselves, when it grew dark. Wherefore in the Euenings, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day, He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves; and occupied the two most ordinary passages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopamen Campe great store of lights; thought that all had bene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopamen waste the Countrey round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Asiatics. Very faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoeuer hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should recieue other fauours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilst their Embassadours that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where hee had accomplished the marriage betwene Prolemie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadours; cutted them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their leaving forth. One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Linie rather thanks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a useless suspicion wherein he held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainly desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recovered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine surmises: but to know thus much, That so long as hee thought vpon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good service: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Aetolians, and their friends, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vinting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victory against Philip; that finally they preuailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadours had left him without hope of peace, vnlesse he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the uttermost: as knowing, that all the burden must liue vpon Antiochus and himselfe, without helpe from any; save onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. While it they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to concluderashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small piece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore he came to their Panatholium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appeale them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champagne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Libertie: the Atolians, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becoming the Sticklers. As for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skiled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they desired, either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such termes had they beene feasted once already: and were by the Senate reiecte vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they Greece, as well to set the Countie at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending betwene the Romans and Atolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and aginst the Romans. Titus desired of their Prator, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prator answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the river of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Atolians are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritie of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Atolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden; entring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words aginst T. Quintius, had bene driuen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Atolian companions, that were so not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereto they let in a Troupe which they had left not farr behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe aginst them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more insolently dominated ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plain force.

force. For the Townes-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this businesse was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne; styling himselfe King; but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-neere lost all by means of the ouertrow which Philippamen had lately giuen him; since, he durst not stirre abroad; and daily expected the mischance, that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Atolians; requesting them, That as he had bene slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward, so they would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to neede it. It hath bene often said, That the rauenous Atolians were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which vpheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed; they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and by so doing, to assure Lacedamon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirte Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirte were by Damocritus the Prator brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to thinke that they were sent to make waite with the Acheans, or to doe ought else, save onely what Alexamenus should command them; which, were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming aginst all reason; yet must they vnderstand, that vnlesse they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Atolians, He said, that if neede should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater companie. Hercupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bene long pend vpon the Citie; and traine them without the walls: as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside aloneto his Atolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand: He then went aside to his thirte Horse-men, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them; and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and strucke him downe. The thirte Atolians neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body: where in stead of seeking reuenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Atolians hastned into the Citie, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall Stokke, that had bene brought vp with Nabis his children, whom they mounted vpon a good Horse, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the Atolians that were idly stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedaemon, Philopemen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexander should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant, easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselves with the Achaens. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians, and the small, but effectually, trauaile of Philopemen, the Achaens made a notable purchase: and Lacedaemon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Aetolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages betwene him, the Aetolians, Chalcidians and others. Hewins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Euboea. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Aetolians, with the Ciuill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achaens. That is concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betwene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and rauels away the rest of winter. Vpon the coming of the Roman Consul all for sake Antiochus. He with two thousand Aetolians keeps the Sireights of Thermopylae. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsaue, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behinde him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet he was desirous with all speede convenient to them himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore hartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conserue vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Aetolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had already taken Demetrius; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vsit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Cartaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feeble the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should bealwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being ielous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon. Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a stiuolous pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ithum there to doe sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrius. Eurylochus the Magnesian, the same whom the Aetolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrius; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the *Magnesian*s found not the like cause of ioy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were seruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and sixe Elephants. The Aetolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Conncell, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hasted vnto their aide, euen whilest the season was vsite for nauigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrey free indeede, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not be any way burdened vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in neede. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betwene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Conncell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceiued them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there bene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must haue bene contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Conncell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whether it they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture neede to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behinde him at Demetrius. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsfull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery severall Estate had where to finde redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them onely, so to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute, was kept vnder, by any Garison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since hee, and the Atolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Atolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the rest of the Island shortly yielded to Antiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Bootia, lying ouer against the Island; where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuiolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilst others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger, as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Atenippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke advantage of their carelesse, and vied them with all extremity of warre. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wisest sort returned such answer, as the Calcidians had done. Some reserved themselves, vntill he should come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He must hold them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if he came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, ioynd with him in true meaning; save the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Atolians, and now feared the Achaens. Little reason therewas, that he should thinke to draw the Achaens to his partie. Neuertheless he assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopamens vertue, had bred a secret dislike betwene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Atolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Agium; who that spared not braue words, if the Achaens would haue beene so taken. The Kings Embassadors told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming, reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimians, and Cadusians; names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydians, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphylans were; such indeede as could not be resisted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdome of Asia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much decieued: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue like: the case was too farre different. Yet this most powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the vmoost parts of the East; requested no more of the Achaens, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilst He tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Atolian Embassador, and further added, That in the battell at Cynosephala, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers; but that both He and his Armie had beene there destroyed, had they not bene protected by vertue of the Atolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue beene desired. He told the Achaens, That neither the Kings Embassadors, nor the Atolians, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lincked the King and the Atolians together. For euen such bragges is here they made, before the Achaens who knew them to be lyers, had the Atolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene fastned by the King, with such tales as his Embassadors told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimians, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, where with a friend of his at Chalcis (no such venter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whereat he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than for many pieces of one tame swine, dressed after severall fashions with varietie of sauces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Atolians; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Countrey, from Demetrias to Lamia, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: where with since both Antiochus and the Atolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much persuasion is needlesse. The Achaens did not loue so well the Atolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the worst subjects. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Atolians.

How the hatred betwene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appeares in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons: the one, the Romans, the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them wisely: though tarr the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Atolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrey at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue bene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue fought, not how Smyrna and Lampfacus might recover their liberty (which had neuer bene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiaticques, which originally were Greekish; than the generall applause, where with all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take arms euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrey, had bene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achaens were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtful answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Baotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vied. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Atolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Abhama: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pédigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forfather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good titles as he. But for the enabling of them herunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects; or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynosephale, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this churcheable act, as if it were to them any benefit all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended merely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them: wherein they should be pleased to vse him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Boeotians, and Athamanians, hauing now all ioyned with him; Antiochus took counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessel of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before bene asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Boeotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought most behooufull, to win King Philip of Atacedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to reuocall and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meane to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what neede was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, Thessalie is the present; and namely, this Thos, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motines which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insulence of the Romans: likening that King to some wilde beast, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage, let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present war in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprize, wherein now you are embroiled against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Where to had you then giuen ear, the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy & Gaul should haue been on fire with war; and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italy. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet & Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, laden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouths.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italy, whilst you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice, who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of warre, yet how to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile youer you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessalie; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprietor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountaines toppes as farre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had bene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; He brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as hee could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example, and the souldiours as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise that when heooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loosenesse of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus tell to him by lot; whereas otherwise Hee was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and distrust, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boeians; wherein hee purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, & fiftene Elephants. Prolemie King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Prolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the detraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his money was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto *Philip*s Embassadours answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Acilius the Consul.

Consul. Massinissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And here in Massinissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage, as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertooke to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-mony, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerly pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receive the price of it. 10

The halitie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betwene the Roman and the Astarchick souldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece, partly by fire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Babius, having recovered many places; and the Romans Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; Hee was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminander is wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking stocke, and sent a-20 way prisoner to Rome. The Thessilians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behinde, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who hauing withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of neede, Hee found all the promises of the Aetolians merely verbal: and himselfe reduced into tearmes of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal 30 as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-seene all this long before. Neuertheless: He sent word to the Aetolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their owne neede to be no lesse than his. But the Aetolians had cause to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, then that Thousas and his fellows had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since 40 therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: Hee seized vpon the Streights of Thermopylae, as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come.

Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath bene spoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece, vnlesse they could wime this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betwene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three dayes together, against a World of men coming to invade the Countrey. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great intraces, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than hee had in his owne Armie. There whilst he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Aetolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus; but at leastwise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the

the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sicknesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them bene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Aetolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifullly reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore iourney (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skillfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes; He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst Hee, being a very able man of body, tooke in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men, and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae bene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any traailers to search out the passages of these desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead 20 him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which hee discovered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Aetolians very neer vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lustie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and wiled them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Aetolians were no more than fixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee presently set vpon the Aetolians; ouerthrew them; slue a great part of them; and chased the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun betwene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and druen them into their Campe, found 30 it in a manner a desperate peece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe, which occupied the whole breadth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred downe a shoure of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Aetolians had bene coming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Romane armes and ensignes were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Romane Army from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse drave Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence 40 with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Aetolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recovered health, came to ioine with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victory was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Aetolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea, and Philip, Lamia, 50 at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who saine would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him, but it could not be. For his Macedonians that vied to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to betaken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoyle of these Towns was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Aelius, that could foill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was ready to cufe him of his charge.

The losse of Heracles did so affright the Asiatians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece, or if any thing withheld him from continuing imposition, at leastwise to helpe them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Asiatians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thibias, another of their Embassadors, hee retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heracles was taken from them, then did the Asiatians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consull to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consull would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent Leu. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their coming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deserued of the Romans. Wherevnto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euery times, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consull. This phrase of committing vnto the faith, signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consull heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was; and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said Hee, I commaund you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any business priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicaearchus the Asiatian, Menestriatus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countreymen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yielded themselves vnto his faith; nor vnto slauerie. What? (said the Consull) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consull, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apoletian or ordinarie Councell of the Nation, were able to fulfill their iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This succedance of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heracles; when Philip had bene commanded away from Lamia, that he might haue worne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further neede of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consull was busie with the Asiatians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamania, Perthabia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Asiatians, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that that Nicanor about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles; and Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being farre gone thence. His monie Nicanor conueighed into Lamia, by verry vniuallthicketerie. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Asiatians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his iourney; which lay betwene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as farre as they could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians, by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or vled ill enough by Philip. But it sosemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his seruants to entreat Nicanor friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Asiatians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse, forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but would needes be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more auailable vnto each of them; than their mutual catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signifie vnto his Countreymen; and priuately to hold in minde the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the war of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans, and therefore was hid away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consull vnderstood, that the Asiatians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: hee forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Nauropactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Nauropactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue bene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So He staid there: welnecre all the following time of his Consullship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Acheans made farre better vse of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victory, subdued the Abthamanians and others. The Acheans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long bene addicted to the Asiatian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That as his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeelde. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annexe themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Miestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes: it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once bene Philips, and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander who sent a Governour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driven out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Ile to the Acheans; whom hee found ready Chappmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Achaens referred themselves vnto his discretion. So hee told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Torreyse, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger, but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponnesus, hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two moneths, that might haue bene farre better spent. There, whether out of compassion which hee had vpon the Aetolians, or out of dislike of King Philips thriuing so fast: He perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; to aske pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus and submitting themselves, craue pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Aetolians haue made such earnest suit as they did. vnto Rome, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had bene sure to carrie it, in any short space: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came vnto Rome, no treaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two: That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much mony: neither could they wel so hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnderstood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilst the Aetolians were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consull had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to set things in order among the tractable Achaens. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedaemonians home into their Countrey; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Common-wealth. This the Achaens liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedaemonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne mere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Achaens: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The Romane Admirall C. Linius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fise and twenty saile of Rhadians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of saile: 40 but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he tooke himselfe to a speedie retreat.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betwene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Aetolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare, thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate their this Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his younger sonne; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which so regard hee desired the Senate not to foreflow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vse it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolemy was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent the beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himselfe a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had bin in another world; but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a battell for his Kingdome. §. VIII.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, hauing with him Publius the African his elder brother; for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Aetolians, that so bee might as leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An inuasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, rayged by an handfull of the Achaens. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it: The battaile of Magnesia; wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, & should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had bene victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had an absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wisdom was much approved, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a signe of the freedom that he vsed in his censures, even whilst hee liued in such a Court. Antiochus mistruied his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him wish, that he had bene serued by such braue men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the world: meaning, that all this Cost vpon the backs of Cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to guess. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of his seruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.

The Scipio made all haste away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about fise thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Aemilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphyssa a Citie of the Aetolians. The Aetolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vnregarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went He to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot, and fise hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyssa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; wherein they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Aetolians:

the Ouertrow newly mentioned, which caused Seleucus to giue over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or fīue Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of fīfteen and thirty Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not farre aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Praefaces vnto the warre; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him foure score and nine Gallies; and fīue of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vented the last yeere; That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fīftee Gallies; the Rhodian more light timbered and thin plancke, hauing all aduantage of speede, and good Sea-men. Neither forbred they to helpe themselves by the same deuice; with which, fīue of their Gallies had got they to helpe the Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being flummed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile: and hauing a faire winde, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behinde them: wherof thirteene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three shippes: but got hereby the absolute Mastrerie of the Sea.

The report of this misaduenture, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had bene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: He presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue bene kept, euentill the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers vnto termes of great extremitie. Hee (if the sieg had bene continued obstinately) vnto termes of great extremitie. Hee also gaue ouer the si-³⁰ ge of Colophon: and laying aside all thought saue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Antiochus rather the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellepont, but had yielded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that hee landed quietly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrie had bene his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embassador that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampascus, and Lysimachia, had bene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strīue with the Romans about Lampascus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should bee also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their hands. It all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, wherewith they had bene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves content with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; He expected their answer. These offers which to the Embassador seemed so great, were iudged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his owne fault: and that he should not onely depart out of these few Townes, which he held in Asia and Tonia; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadors therefore saw, that that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publike businesse: He onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now no other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition wherby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had bene already subdued: little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein hee could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to auoid it hee must giue away. Hee had with him threescore and tenne thousand Foot, and twelue thousand Horse, besides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neere him apace as one hasting to fight. But howsoeuer he was affected; He made for little thew of feare, so that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Flea, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickenesse, and without not desirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That heerein hee dealt craftily. For since he could haue none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courteisie before the battell, as would afterwards haue bene little worth; than to stay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue bene much auailable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, Hee said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus refused to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, Hee fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him Z. Scipio the Consul; and sac downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse driuen backe ouer the River. Two daies were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduenture: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom their ordinarie Corps d'agard repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul tooke aduice what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoeuer disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Country of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vnlesse they would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, That this great Armie should be assayed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed; in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being very loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battells:

Hee also did the like; and advanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Romane Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were fūe thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vſually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted form, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at ſuch diſtance as was vſual; and laſt of all, the Triarij. Now beſide theſe, there were about three thouſand Auxiliaries; partly Achaens; and partly ſuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnmoſt of all (ſee ſome five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almoſt three thouſand Horſe: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the reſt being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troupes of horſe were placed there, though ſuch helpe ſeemed in a manner needleſſe. Two thouſand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conſul had with him ſixteene African Elephants, which he beſtowed in his Rere: ſo much as had they come to fight with thoſe of Antiochus; they onely would haue ſerued to diſcourage his men; as being ſure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more courageous beaſts: whereof Antiochus had likewiſe much advantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuerſly appointed, and not 20 all accuſtomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the ſeueral kinde, in ſuch wiſe as each might be of moſt vſe. The maine ſtrength of his Foote conſiſted in ſixteene thouſand, armed all Atacedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. Theſe hee placed in the middleſt, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirty in File, and fifte in Front. Betwene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beaſts, and ſuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Crefſes, Towers on their backs, and beſides him that governed the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible ſhew. On the right hand of theſe were ſixteene hundred Horſe of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thouſand Barbd Horſe: and a Regiment of almoſt a thouſand Horſe, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and 30 accompanied by ſome others. All which Troupes of Horſe, diuided in their ſeueral kinde, doe ſeeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin ſtretched out in Front. Adioyning vnto theſe, were ſixteene Elephants together in one ſlocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyſpides, or Silverſhields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like ſo valiant as thoſe of the ſame name, that had ſerued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on horſebacke, three thouſand light-armed Footce, two thouſand and five hundred Archers of Aſia; with foure thouſand ſlingers and Archers of the Circean, & Elymaens. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like number of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horſe: as alſo two thouſand Horſe that were ſent from Ariarathes, with two thouſand and ſeuē hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thouſand Horſe more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all theſe Horſe were the Chariots armed with hooks or ſythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon ſate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would ſerue to reach from thoſe high Camels. Beyond theſe were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Piſidians, Cyrcæans, Elymaens, and manie others, hauing alſo with them ſixteene Elephants. Antiochus himſelfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded 50 over the Phalangiers.

The firſt on-ſet was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horſe; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eaſily made 50 and fruſtrate the danger threatned by them both. For with ſhowings, and noyſes, and ſome wounds, they were driuen out of the ſeldie; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the ſame harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Romane Horſe following this advantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no reſiſtance, ſome being out of order; others being without courage. It is ſhamefull to rehearſe, and ſo ſtrange, that it may hardly ſeeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with with ſuch varieties of Auxiliaries, made little or no reſiſtance; but all of them fledde, in a manner, as loone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himſelfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and ſeeing the Latines, that ſtood oppoſite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horſe: gaue vpon them courageouſly, and forced them to retire. But M. Amilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, iſſued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perſwaſion, what by threats made them renew the fight. Succour alſo came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus diſcouered the approach; Hee not onely turned his Horſe about, but ranne away vpon the ſpur without further tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is ſaid to haue loſt in this battaile ſixtie thouſand Foot, and foure thouſand Horſe, beſides thoſe that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not ſlaine about three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horſe: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the ſame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the cuſtodie of Sardes, and the Caſtle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townſmen and Souldiers were ſo diſmayed with the greatneſſe of the Ouerthrow, that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in thoſe parts, without expecting ſummons, yeelded vp themſelues by Embaſſadors: whom they ſent to the Romans, whilſt they were on the way. Neither were many daies ſpent, ere Antiochus his Embaſſador was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would pleaſe the Romans to impoſe vpon the King his Maſter. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the anſwere, becauſe that it ſhould be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he ſhould quite abandon his Dominions on this ſide Taurus. For their charges in that Warre, they required ſixtene thouſand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thouſand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome ſhould haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thouſand, in twelve yeeres next enſuing by euē portions. Likewiſe they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes, and ſome 30 ſcore of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now beſides twentie hoſtages which they required, very earneſt they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thobas the Aſſolan, with ſome others who had ſtirred vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wiſe man might ſo eaſily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpoſe to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaſſadour had full commiſſion, to reſuſe nothing that ſhould be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to ſend immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Conſuls choſen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Vulſo. The Atolians deſired peace, but could not obtaine it: becauſe they would 40 accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Conſuls ſhould make warre vpon the Atolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Aſia. Now though ſhortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquiſhed in battaile, and had ſubmitted himſelfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet ſince the State of Aſia was not like to bee ſo thoroughly ſetled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Aſia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soone after this, came the Embaſſadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhadians and ſome others: yea by King Eumenes in perſon; whoſe preſence added a goodly luſtre to the buſineſſe in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with 50 King Antiochus, there was no diſputation: it was generally approued. All the trouble was, about the diſtribution of the purchaſe. King Eumenes reckoned vp his own deſerts; and comparing himſelfe with Masaniſſa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiſull to him than they had bene to the Numidian, ſince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniſſa was onely ſuch in title; and ſince both hee and his Father had alwaies bene their friends, euē in the very worſt of the Romane fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would haue: He ſtill referring himſelfe to their courtieſie; and they deſiring him to ſpeake plaine. At the length hee craued they would beſtow vpon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greece Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the King in his Warre, it was no reason that they should be gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodiens did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against him as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euery one had 10 cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deferred; though the verue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The A. Tolians, and the Gallogrecques, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fuluius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Bookes of Hermis; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Romane Nobilitie.

MARCUS Fuluius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided between them, 30 which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the A. Tolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Romane Masters, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the A. Tolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie, which was, to entreate the Rhodiens and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neyther were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well de- 40 uise, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied advantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Albanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuered with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of commaund, vsed by the Capitaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vnderooke the worke. Yet assur- 50 rance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with a thousand A. Tolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time by his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Townes in the Countrey, to his vie. The same of this good successe at first, with diuers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Thium a few dayes; giuing thereby some leasure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home sixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, hee left all but two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athens, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontiers of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Thium a while, to take a place lying out Argibeas, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed; yet neither hee, nor the King had the boldness to descend vpon Argibeas; for that, they might perceiue the Albanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them, when they should be to busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially, when Aminander came in sight with his thousand A. Tolians. The Macedonians were called back, from wards Argibeas, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and A. Tolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine fight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The A. Tolians hauing found the business of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilechians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently reuolted, and became A. Tolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had bene euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the A. Tolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse, for that newes came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consul his halting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excoales to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take in despite, that hee had recovered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemed it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they 30 neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the business, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had bene the chiefe seat of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the A. Tolians: yet could not by them be reliqued, vnlesst they would adventure to fight vpon equal ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the A. Tolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilechians and Dolopians. They were vnable to 40 deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not bee terrified, by any violence of the assaillants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driuen to leaue vnto his successeur the honour of finishing the Warre, Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the A. Tolians, and bad them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it overdeare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. Hee also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediator, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excoales, the 50 conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not vnassufferable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodiens, accompanied those of the A. Tolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a verie grievous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Heereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediators of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The A. Tolians were bound to vphold the Maistie of the people of Rome, and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Armie ouer Taurus, and aduenturing vpon the calamitie threatned by Sibyls verses, vnto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamitie or ouerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophetic threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that march'd with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a fort, the Countreies on the other side of the Mount, which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeede the accomplishment of this prophetic, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptoleme King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, foresat at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by enunt; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptoleme to his Kingdom by Gabinius the Roman, should haue any way betokened the comming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue bene well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophetic. Of the Sibylline predictions I haue sometimes thought reuerently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common belief, and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made me suspit, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not onely those prophetices of Sibyl, wherein Christ fo plainly was shewed, but euen the bookes of Acherus, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited peeces, and at first entertained (whosoever deuised them) by the vnderfet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strenghtned with foreine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from a meane Authors. Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, thin that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Phylosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lined and flourish'd, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken a misse in place of Simoni Sango: a title four hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Virinius a Rebelle, had many ages before bene consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historically, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the rich, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the

the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipios were called one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Polleritic. P. Scipio the African, with whom they beganne, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came, hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the People, That vpon the same day of the 10 yeere he had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke warre, by a signal victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabbe at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there giue thanks to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And here he inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the fawenteenth yeere of his life, vntill hee now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that his Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the 20 Court, followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne flunies and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cycled him to iudgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrequest, a further day. After this, when the African perceiued that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Liernum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his priuate behauiour 30 at Liernum, render it probable, that hee out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers: who meant to haue drawn him backe to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was, the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Asiaticque. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching many receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Praetors, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of their contentions, and infigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugall also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde 40 he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was hee vmerciful and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with crueltie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilst he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in highest estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had bene at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and like ly to carry it, hee took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periuire. That hee had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and silver, gotten in the 50 Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios grew partly, (besides his generall spite at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That hee had no neede of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of iudgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipios, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerer inquite and iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was scene condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should haue beene laid vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had beene condemned to pay, then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had beene against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinned, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punick Warre. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especial helps to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factitious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrellsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frays and murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sonnes, whilst they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senators began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who prevailed therein, meanes to make him selfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally caused to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cesar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailing against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subiects vnto the arbitrary government of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeede attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor belested of her selfe as if shee had, whilst a King late crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this confirmation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discover.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

6. 1.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insolently with the Acheans. The Macedonian, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth hee becomes ialous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Acheans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arrivall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and warre, To beate Monie, and to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeals, or last resort, as euery pettie iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vterly dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interpolated their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein effectall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the feuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grieuous; or, as being skillfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearfull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformance vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they very louing vnto Masaniissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion seized in Africke: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the ministry of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vfeull and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needefull, to transport them ouer the Hellepont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the Suites of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Aenus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselves.

These Townes of Ennus and Maronea had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his Dominion very far.

*Trist of Hion-gus by Mari-Tuanus, lib. 3.

He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transluania: in which Prouince it is said, That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, to wherein he vanquished and slue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemy Ceraunus wherein he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gauls being ouer-past, those Countreies which lately had bene oppressed by them, recoverd their libertie; and not onely held it, but leamed, some of them, especially the Dardaniens and wilde Thracians, to finde their advantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, where-by the Dardaniens might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Aitolians, of wrongfull vspiration and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereunto hee made a good answer, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ennus and Maronea: That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, in the dispute: in about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ennus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes: who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Cheronea, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betweene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuerthelesse, he sent Embassadors to Rome, who thereto maintaine his right vnto these Townes: wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Aitolians: wherein whatsoever hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten to himselfe out of the quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he was to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselves, in pleading against him for their libertie, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians cians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done: but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene feared, of these proceedings, that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maiestie, to an accompt. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites: affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadors to enquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who suruiued, were either his owne friends, or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more seuer, and more thoroughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Maronea, nor nere to it, hee requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because hee should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him paysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machi- and taught vnto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing bene apt scholars in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vnjust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger sonne Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him

30 instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had bene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing bene well approved by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat more onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilst this business with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had bene Iudges betweene him and his 40 neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedaemonians against the Acheans. It was objected vnto the Acheans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedamon: That vnto this crueltie they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Praetor of the Acheans, made answer, That these banished Lacedaemonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them; were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they solaid the blame vpon others: the Acheans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to be chiefe authours of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedamon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retratts and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedamon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals

and hemmed in the Spurians, had also quire abolished Lycorgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achaens; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, on elsse would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedemonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycorgus plainly tolde App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadors, That hee and his Countreimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answere and giue account of their actions, as vassals and slaues to the People of Rome. For if they were indeede at libertie: why might not the Achaens as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did to see themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, and intimate as they beganne, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to raise it: then must the Achaens haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, adde indeede fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycorgus, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking stare vpon him, he pronounced more like a Matter than a Iudge, That if the Achaens would not be ruled by faire means, and eare thanks whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Achaens; which also groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hercupon the Embassadors restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make void all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had bene laid by the Achaens vpon any Citizen of Lacedemon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedemon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achaean Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had bene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Spuria to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-weales whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves, by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and perswasion of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their priuate passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euer more bought reuenge at the price of selfe-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as shortly he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indigntie soone following. Hee had bene long, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of obiections, whereto his youth, vnkillfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as hee had receiued from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his his hatred vnto Rome, and breede in him a ieaousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadors from Rome; some bringing one commandement; some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had bene imposed vpon him by their fore-goes. Neither were there wanting that obserued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than hee needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conuersant; rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the King, should not succede vnto his father, but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius; if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his yonger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceede vnto the bitter fruits of this ieaousie, it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

²⁰ The death of Philopemen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most unhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late bene so peremptorie with the Achaens; that they seemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hercupon the Messinians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achaean Common-wealth, hauing long bene of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, leuored from communion with any other. This was the deuce of some that were powerful in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achaean League. And hercupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the same of their commotion and proceedings; Philopemen, then Prætor of the Achaens, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achaens, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse, he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vially were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messinians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chace, there arrived, by chauce, a supply of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that were fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopemens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopemen himselfe had long bene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to be negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselves vnder his conduct. Hee tooke vpon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messinians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnghappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his Horse, and being withall in very weak plight of body, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleueed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleueed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne forth to meet him, him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Treater, that there they might satistie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuerie them from Nabis the Tyrant, began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Disocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vnrueged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had bene made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cuppe of poyson, which Philopemen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakened with long sickness, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaens, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselves, for that they had bene more mindefull to preferue their owne liues, than to looke vnto the sake of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were adueniing what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched vnto Alessene, crauing his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serue. Lycortas was chosen General of the Armie against Alessene: who coming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeelde. Then Disocrates, knowing what he was expected, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had bene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the ashes of Philopemen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis: where they were all of them slaine at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended.³⁰

Q. Marius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. Hee would haue entemedled in this businesse of Alessene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most sightfull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Linie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuided some secret fallies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any reasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as hee well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, hee tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwaies preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerser fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he vttered these words: I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of this feare, which hath so many yeeres possesed them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius ouer me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer be numbred among the rest of his heroicall decdes: Nozt shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers; as, when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italie, and was ready to giue them battaile at their owne dores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson:

son; whereas these of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith giuen, and contrary to the Lawes of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliuer vp his owne Gheft. He then curling the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Capitaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragic we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vnderooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publicke force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolve it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Country and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ialousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Protection more vnpropitious than that of Men of Warre, and great Capitaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ialousie of men, the spoyle, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Moultre the Marthill of France confesse, That were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues, haue raised them above the leuell of their inferiours, and haue furnished their enuie: yet haue they bene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hercof; as Coriolanus, Alcornus, L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom wee haue lately buried. Among the Grekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Iobab. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Atius: who, after many other victories, overthrow Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was stricken in the world: for there fell of those that fought beside runne-awyes, an hundred and foure score thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Atius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Atius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Atius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Atius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolved then obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or farre worse, had Nellus, whose vnder takings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and hee died a blinde begger. Narjes also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Iustine. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well obserued in euery age since then: to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indecde a Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomar; Selim strangle Bassa Musapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Vassiers. Of the Spaniards Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who drave the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico, were crowned with nettles, nor with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to wear garlands on. And that the great Capitaines of all Nations haue bene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall

in consideration, that these high places haue bene giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emp. rours, which haue traitorously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderstandedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue, is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of a Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniuently gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Insigne, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of wine. Insigne, hauing recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Insigne, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasi, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surpris'd his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasi, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue bene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinance, and perhaps the best way of thriving, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vntankfulness in this kinde, hath bene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and he deliuered the Citie by his wisdom: but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue bene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them thinke to fauour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes coozened and abused, which proves that weaknesse to be in them: indeede, whereof they so gladly thinke the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most inuiously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloined somewhat from the common Treasury. Hereof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being solatily recited.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to vndertake, her Maiestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwife honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her dayes neuer received dishonor, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.

For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randel, Dreweire, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Constable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others:

so those of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Pere were the most famous, & who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Colonels, haue left belinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauels and wounds) nor little nor little to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Willeoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

That her Maiestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleeue other men than her selfe, a disease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue bene subiect, I say that such confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it nor but in some sort accuse her of weaknesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martiall men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a profession farre more noble than their owne, seeing therein they should onely minde their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deserving, and of farre greater vlt than themselves.

But his Maiestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yeere 1588, as in Caliz, the Flinds, and in our owne Sea; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiestie hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russet, Carew, Danners, Aranuel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

Philip making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subiects. His negotiation with the Bastarne. His crueltye. Hee suspecteth his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue bene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perseus, hee dieth.

Philip Martius the Roman Embassador, who trauelled vp and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not seeme to haue discovered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enioyned him; yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than mere necessity should enforce him thereto. Headed further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which hee was deuising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnesse to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwife (as to him seemed apparent) by what meanes soeuer. Hee was in an ill case: as hauing bene already vanquished by them; hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet hee provided as well as hee could deuisie, against the necessity which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, hee compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Bithynia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Strabians, whose faith hee thought yet more assured, against should wait vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceiued of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus; that conuerted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him, He said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, He were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a iaculous father. That he would conclude nothing vpon the excessse or error, whatsoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better obseruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he my seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gaue himself ouer wholly to Perseus: vnto little conference with his yonger sonne, that when hee had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor nere vnto him. Above all, he had especial care, to learne out what had passed betwene Demetrius and T. Quintus, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadours to Rome, Philotes and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrells betwene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to bee written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeted) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vniuifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traitor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if hee had pitied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discouered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to liue in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuerſion vnto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatsoeuer his hopes & meanings were, all came to nought through the fallshood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a prooffe sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings vnadvised sentence, first gaue payson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon hee sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie: who villainously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not bene found a King, that had thus cruellie dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houſes of Eysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or euen vpon their heales; by intestine discord and ialousies, so grounded on desire of foueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnaturall hatred, had almost bene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and Seleucus: which though narrowlie they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously disordered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that vpspring family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of weere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly hee had reason for to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord; than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus the Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himselfe of an vnmodest nature; & therefore wanted to be a good perswader, and kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne payson. After the death of his sonne, Her too late began to examine the crimes that had bene objected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole proccesse. His onely remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause; than the removing of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his visuall trouble of minde, and carelesse of making prouision against them. Hee was more diligently cōsulted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betwene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspicious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer bene flow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed; and so much the more, for that hee knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Perseus; and thus becoming subject vnto the same iaculous impression which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsaillour, when hee found that the anger conceiued against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philotes and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xechus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vied by those Embassadours. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xechus for feare of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that he had bene employed by the Embassadours in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he vnderstood that by the vnaturall practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and innocent. He ragged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischief. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philotes was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not denie it when Xechus confronted him, yielded himselfe guilty, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrey: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. Hee kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whilst his father wintered at Demetrius. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive griefe of minde, so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thinke his own perueſe condition: since his Vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was iustly punished by feeling the difference betwene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilest yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified vnto Perseus, by Caligennes the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse imprudently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IIII.

How the Bastarna fell vpon Dardania. The behavior of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniſſa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more vnto the Romans, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Acheans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarna into Thrace: where order had bene taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnity of the Countrey. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as no other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or suffered, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all doubt and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markers vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarna would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes repofed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarna had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countreies. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seems that by the careless vse of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romanes was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the settling of his Estate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for warre or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee saue personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein he was too ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceived this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, hee had care to auoid all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was hee negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the maistring passion, which ouer-ruled his minde, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooue of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romanes continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istria, subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heauy hand: and suffered Masaniſſa to take from them what hee lifted. The Carthaginians; like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romanes. Masaniſſa therefore had great advantage ouer them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romanes not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had He once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrey of Empiria; and so did he vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniſſa had worne some land from the Carthaginians; so which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loss of his Wife Sopheniba, and of Afarbal his Father-in-law. This did Masaniſſa take from them by force: and by the Romanes, to whose iudgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masaniſſa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them aboue seuentie Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romanes. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniſſa, invading their Countrey, howsoeuer hee was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romanes, they durst not presume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romanes indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, That the Romanes yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masaniſſa should be allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romanes would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them grace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And heere withall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines, of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased, slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, & in all Cities of Africk & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masaniſſa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romanes, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue bene their owne. But the Romanes had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canna; than Hannibal that won it was vied by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his private riches, vpon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without crauing recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an Armie into Spain, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pitifull behaviour bredde peraduenture some commiseration; yet their reares may seeme to haue bene mistrusted, as proceeding no lesse from enuie vnto the Romanes, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniſſa; which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes : but contrariwise, when without leave obtained they presumed to farre, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gisulfa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage; had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that businesse. (Only it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell divers nights, in the Temple of Afculapius: whereupon he himselfe was so dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senators, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome.) This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoever was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence; in taking from the Carthaginians thole lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gisulfa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian waire was euen ready to begin : at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa : by the Carthaginians; partly for feare, partly for hope of better visage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been vnmindfull of Perseus. They visite him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These hee entertained kindly at first, untill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereinto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania; neither would they take any satisfaction, untill the Bassarna were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did unto other some. Where hee did harme to any; they called it, making waire vpon their friends : Where hee did good; they called forth his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vn certaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flue Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemed that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian; and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed to farre, vnlesse either they had been extremely prouoked, or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them; Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angrily this presumption of the King : euen as if hee had invaded some Countie of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league between them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes : whom usually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achaens had good experience : whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne cariers, and whose hope of extraordinary fauour at Rome caused them them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie; yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably, at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing into the good grace of the Romans. Who neuerthelesse, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to grieve; especially in vsurping the practice of Armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Cities. In learning this hardlesse, they were such vntoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Romane Senate, being desirous to humble the Achaens, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betwene them; but further, with a carelesse insolencie, reiected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as sweared with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedemonians, or Corinthians, would resort from the Achaens; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopamen : at what time it was beleueed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prator of the Achaens had utterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Achaens, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Cities) That they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates : not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against mere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome : vnlesse peradventure sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Romane Arts howsoever many (for gainefull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Cities in Greece, having neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, untill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preserve their liberties and lands, from consuming by piece-meale; they were to bee deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonians, as the most vnpleasant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue soe affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betwene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopamen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, wherinto Greece was likely to bee reduced, by the Romane patronage. Indeede they not onely perceived the approaching danger : but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publique to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestick conspiracies would soone be at an end; when honestie and love of the Common weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful prouision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly aduertised: yetther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to bee little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnrerogated among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from these that are feared or flattered by many. The Achaens being to send Embassadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man, one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alleading what was meetest in iustificacion of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Achaens and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the settling of their authority, among his froward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee regarded; any inuincion from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achaens both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if Hee, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wills: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columnes or Monument erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue eare vnto such persuasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vttered to be more plausible, than any discoursetending against it: yet if they which vnderooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they became the prevalent faction. It was therfore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greekes who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert, only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughlie those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsaile, in euery point; yea to depreesse all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achaens, than had beene their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedaemon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates, they aduised all men, to be such, and and so affected, as hee was, in their feuerall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countrey into the way of ruine; but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless hee forbore to vaunt himselfe; of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely hee so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith hee threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts he obtained to be made Pretor of the Achaens: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, hee omitted nothing, that might serue to manifest his ready obsequiousnesse vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes wonne many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberrall gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeste than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonian; and some few, respecting onely the good of the Estates, wherein they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: whercof if not any one alone, yett all of them together, shall afford them iust occasion to make warre vpon him. Perseus hauing finished his businesse among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Armie along with him; yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe, to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadours or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoeuer, done by his father, might be buried with his father; since his owne meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue bene pleased better, if hee had behaued himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a iourney, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the loue of the Achaens: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was ieaalousie perhaps, more than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, giuen them cause to abhorre him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vse all circumspection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of inuasion was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nouthing deadly hated, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achaens reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdoms of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduencure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vse. But Perseus tooke hold vpon this occasion: as fitly seruing to pacifie those, whose enmity saue he would haue changed into loue. Hee therefore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achaens, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hee after they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater party, being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Councill. But Callicrates took the matter very angrily, and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Hee would haue tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achaens beforehand acquainted with the Warre, that was coming vpon Perseus from Rome. Hee told told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly Heere heard all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the invasion of the Bastarnæ, vpon the Dardanians; the Kings iourney against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the event of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Heereto good answer was made by the Prators brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renewed his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that Hee had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This beeing so: why might not the Achaens, as well as the Atolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuerthelesse Callicrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffly gainsay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without an Embassadour; they knew not how to resolute. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needs vige them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was prooue sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

6. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodian and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vnusuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly love betwene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his deuice to payson some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure, he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonians; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on) his father and him) began to waxe euery where tale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirec courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not bee faued by his patronage, from seuerer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a Decree of the Achaens, as too vnmeasured, misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deseruings. All this (which hee needed not to haue regarded, had hee not beene too vainly ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-seruicable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse heereof; hee thought it in vaine to strive any longer with bouny, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore hee resolutely euen to ouerturne the foundations of this popularitie, by inducing the Romans vterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end hee made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in businesse of neighbours; his riches, and his great prouisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Onely he descended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great. The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Soldiours as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to lye vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Selencus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Selencus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vter it plainly) That euen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans; & that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would be to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should fell vpon them in Italie. Neuerthelesse forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intentment. Now though it were so that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadors, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustificatiion of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then vsuall curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemed to have disclosed all: when the wariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever beene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by Sea vnto Persus, his bride Laidice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despoightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were setting themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere vassalls, but as dependants and associates. For prooffe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the tenne Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masiinissus, The Atolians, and all other Kings or Estats, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to finde themselves grieued if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily be made their fellowes, whensoever it should please the Senate: thought it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was onely to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Persus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more newly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassages they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all cares had beene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Persus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deede or word of his, that might fauour of hostilitie; but that, if his traualle in this kinde proved vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe: by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These bigge words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that whose chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction giuen by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Persus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speede better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude, it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouraging his too much weaknesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subiect (in appearance) to Fortune; which might haue beene his, had he knowne how to vse it.

Now that this brauery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat, it appears by his daring to aduenture soone after, on a practice that so more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in turning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Persus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themselves behinde a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Ile of Arginus, where he was cured: being all the while kept secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as King, and either tooke or would haue taken a wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonice the daughter of King Antiochus, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbered among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, receiued none other checke, than that he should forbear to marrie with the Queene, until hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the preiudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour; when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdom from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren, was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld: as might also that of Macedon haue beene, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Persus.

It is likely that Persus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had faced all from discourie. But as he was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For hee had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this businesse: and sh, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium: who comming newly from the Court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing betwene Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, iourning to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitalitie, he was commended to Persus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of, and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needes doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Persus, in time shortly following, answere for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall profiting, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulness of making warre vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in iudgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger prooffe (which might haue bene easie) than any that wee finde by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Persus was very suteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they iudging him to haue offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if hee might not send men, to waste the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe

it by poyson: Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it vnto him, vntill he would yeelde to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to haue bene so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by thew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. Hee caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long bene collecting against him, and where with Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that Hee had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samos with Embassadors sent to him out of A- 10
Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxa. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-beloued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better then mere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeede onely for feare: but without aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

Liv. lib. 33.

In the forme of the league betwene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Poly- bins, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future;
 excepting those which he immediately performed. But Liuie inserts a clause, whereby he was expressely forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had bene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which 30 neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to finde himselfe a-grieued. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vniust; he ministred occasion vnto the Embassadors, to giue him defiance. 40
 Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either he should haue bene lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vnderstand the warre; he should cou-rageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilest the Enemy was vnprepared, not haue lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worke peace than the former.

The Romans solicite the Greekes to ioyne with them in the warre against Perseus. How the Greekes stood affected in this warre. The timorousnesse of Perseus. Martius a Roman Em-bassador delates him with hope of peace. His forces: He takes the field, and winnes part of Thessalie. The forces of Vicinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this warre. Of tempe in the Salis: and what aduantages the Macedonian had, at which hee had but lost by his feare. Perseus brutes the Romans; fights with them;
 knowes not how to use his vittories: sent for peace: and is denied it by the vanquished.
 10 Perseus having the Thrace in his possession, for takes all the Countrey lying without Tempe.
 The Romans rebuke against the Robbers, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against Perseus. They were the Greekes their friends; for whose sake the Romans made this warre, having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabandians.

So long had the Romans bene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian war, that yett might they haue bene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) becoming hand in positions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a conjuncture of good pretences to make the warre; whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yett all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vneadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others, who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such 30 were the diffidence betwene their severall Estates; howeouer, the generallitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuerthelesse Embassadors were sent to deale with them all, and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadors vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtisie: and vnderstood, that not only such as made refusall, but euery they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans; the Acheans and Rhodians, which were the best of these among them, being rather 40 doubtfull, euery when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their dutie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to let vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue seene the ruine. The vulgar sort was euery where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, at some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished a better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee iudgeth the victory of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yett wished hee the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his en-deuours in this course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed here-50 after. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reue-rence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Acheans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vnderaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not onely to his owne Kingdome, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yett no sooner were some few companies brought ouer-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by

by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeede a great noise, leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more fincenesse in cunning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the King desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King inucreated, and obtained a meeting at the River Pemum. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Where to though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue bene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee sufficed a most convenient season, of winning vpon the enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betwene him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhadians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to treat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betwene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seeme excusable; and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly 30 their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, mengrew daily more and more awefull from him; and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhadians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Bacotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: so whom further, in a sort, they yielded themselves as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall 40 forme; but caused thei feuerall Townes to make couenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebel) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Bacotians from Thebes their head; was more than Agellanus could effect, or Epinionidas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epinionidas; and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the truce; 50 and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprooued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor inucreat, would serue their turne, the Senate being resolu'd before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the wals, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsuall place of giuing audience to open open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short waiting of cleane dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue onely to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest; but it was a likely meane, both to keepe a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his fincenesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should neede it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Laetinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue roused Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate awhile, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome; that so he might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it bene stoutly and wisely followed. He now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. Hee caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Cittium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to know not what Athenia, that was peculiarly honored in his Countrey; and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Cittium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof 20 about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were Trancers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodness of his cause, the greatnesse of his provisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with mony and victuals, according to their feuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them onely to furnish him with carts, for his 30 engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Countrey, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wenne by force. Of these last was Myra, a Towne thought impregnable, and therefore not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a folly; which the Townsmen rashly made, and being driuen 40 backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of warre was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Pelatie and Conanus (townes of much importance, especially Conanus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycyrium, a Towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Laetinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the feuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masaniissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of 50 his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had bene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptoleme (though Ptoleme was then young, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonians, yet yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie trick, wherewith M. Lucritius, the Roman Admirall brother, serued him, for this his counterfeited good will. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the haue of Dyrrachium, vncertain to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind sort, making shew to beleue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Genius had lent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Genius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdome and himselfe, in the end of this warre; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull iourney, through the mountainous Countrey of Atthamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had beene ready, attending to his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonians, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needefull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurres or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vntill they would make an hungry iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by mispending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse, yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either travelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuid, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Atolians, vpon whom the Atthamanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as wee shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Baotians, how politickly soeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodiens, Ilyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning, and increased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their impious pironage ouer Greece, & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which other wise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene expected expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid the danger of that warre, wherof he should haue sought the honour, he left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to provide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, hee chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces, than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inescapable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, is so hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his trenches and lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which, perswaded the Consul to protraie the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he innited the Romans into the field; by waisting the land of the Phereans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduantage euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his advantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified, as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, awhile together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Herby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The Towne of Sycyrium, where Perseus then lay, was twelues miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thisty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, he found out a lodging, seauen miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His coming at such an vnusall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessarie, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good trait) with little losse of his owne. But hee discovered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnfit for: he neuerthelessse tooke it for found aduice, which indeede was timorous and bale. To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which meanes it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalte the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue beene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud termes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Asians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Fiue of them, that were men of especiall marke, had bene obserued to be the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they aduenture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, he not vnill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safetie; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or giuen better heede to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue rowted them whilst they were conuincing themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue bene done, since there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; our 20 of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoyle of them without resistance, as yielding themselves ouercome. With such braue words did the King set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoyle among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor sound. He came neuer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuertheless he was easily perswaded to se the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yield vnto the same 30 Conditions, wherein his Father had bene bound to the Romans; if the warre might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yield both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be so resolute in aduersitie. On the other 40 side, it argued a faint heart in Perseus, that hauing receiued an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycyrium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the coming of Misagenes the sonne of Maianissa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betweene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged all ouer the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilst he stroue to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, saue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connus; hoping to haue taken it, it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perrehiens and others; from whom he won some townes, &c. among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessians, ynto lesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, 10 should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Naue on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other partie Townes, which by that same distraction of the Boeotians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had bene. The causes hercof were to haue bene sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoyling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreme oppression he could haue driuen them to farr. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such 20 time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Only this is said in generall; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and countously demeaned himselfe.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hestilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hestilius shewed more of his indolence, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his Kingdome, after that the Consul had fought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeede on that side which looked 30 towards Thyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of foure thousand, and who, by leaues made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Vsciana, a border Towne of Thyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied forth vpon him, one threw him, and chaled him so farr, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Towne of Vsciana shortly after became Roman: which how soeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recouered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a 40 Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull iourney into Acidolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia, and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe thoroughly beaten by Clentius, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian warre vnto Hestilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speech tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue asked by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lyceus that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; 50 and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achaean horse; but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue bene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstaied from railing troubles, more for lacke of opportunity, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such tales; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hostages, and found some in the Councell that approued the motion; as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their Townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman Nation, accused not onely such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could beleue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to haue beene Traytours. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they used not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seeke redresse of injuries, or to offer their seruices: it is not-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuersarie games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddess. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folde of Alexander, Antigonius, Ptoleme, and the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honors; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddess, and receiued (without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q. Marius the Roman Consul, with extreme difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by Marius, repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. Marius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassador to Marius from the Achaens. Polybius his honest wisdom beneficiall to the Achaens. King Eumenes grooves auerfe from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His false dealing with Genetius King of Illyria; whom he drawes into the Roman warre. He sends Embassadors to the *Rhodian*s. Perseus leueth a mightie succour of the Bastarna, by his wretched parsimonie.

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began, which had beene thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. Hee had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to become wise for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the

the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by very many losses receiued. The Romane Admirals had so demeaned themselves, that many Townes, euen of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans side; and the Armie much lessened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one vpon the other) in licencing the souldiers to depart. Quintus Marius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hostilius, was to amend all this: which neuerthelesse was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. Hee began holily to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And hee began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way hee meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be discovered by the Enemy, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedient foot, to discouer the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficultie of no more than fiftene miles: after which they had sight of the Enemy, that lay to denie their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arrival, but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Camp at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Marius tooke the onely course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men hee left with Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whilst hee, with the rest, fetcht a compass about, and sought out wayes that neuer had beene troden. Herein hee found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding hee overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such iourneys, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make paths where none were, yea where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should be. So steepe he found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which hee tooke: that of seuen miles, which they travelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vpright, and cumberlome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy prospect; and casting their gouernours, made a terrible noyle, which affrighted the horses; and bredde great confusion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grievous iourney; there was nothing more desired by the souldiers, than that they might be suffered to creep backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kind of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other sustained by two long postes, fastned in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or polts, which indeede (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should bee either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, betweene the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turf; that they might seeme continent with the ground; so to make the beasts aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foote of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of these, the postes vpholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sinke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the verie bottom. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to a reuen valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans vsed to be in their iourneys, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested, staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the nearenesse to their waies end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might well haue heard the noyse. Yet was hee so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, saue hearkening after the euent. Four onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romanes were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seeke any other way, must bee faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof onely the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foote of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the riuer Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all this, there was in the middle of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurs of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the verie banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could haue seene his owne advantages. For the Roman Armie was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to return the same way that it came, if the King had made good the sight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreme labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemed a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from above their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though hee knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often bene invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to escape, without enforcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemy was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then hee fared like one out of his wittes; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Heere withall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haste; and straight waies abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, hee sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though some after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so hee preuented the damage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon, it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing alarmed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastic direction, caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diving, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are graue to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely works, for the hiding of his fault; then must hee so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Asclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, where-to they were by him appointed; he rated them openly, saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Armie, this notwithstanding was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing travelled about a daies journey, and gotten one towne that yielded, hee was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had bene carefull to occupy one of the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might come be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected, hee forooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse then foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bene worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwie it had bene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or fight of the Enemy, hee should be faine to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behooued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe; so vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which hee hastily repaired, finding it dismanted by the Romanes. This done; he encamped strongly by the riuer of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue been enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romanes to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, five miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea Townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fieldes about Thessalonica were waiked; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worke. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming nere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Enia, and Antigonea, (standing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioynd with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were were arches in the towne-wall filled vp with that earth, and covered with one single row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by flapping the walls. To this worke he appointed such as he thought meetest; giving an alarme to the other side of the Towne; thereby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for ioy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Capitaines within the towne perceived what was done; and sallying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were betwene the ditch and the wall; of whom they slew about fixe hundred, and suffered few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, and the want of good successe on that part of the towne which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meete to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias; wherinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Capitaine, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not onely sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Melibus; a whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besieger to dislodge in all haste, setting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, then is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perfwaded the Rhodians by Agessipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclaea about other businesse of lesse importance, That they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeite. And so were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary courtresie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their businesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good flecte, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, wherein he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his armie. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Praetor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new armie be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had beene driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of warre: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a crooked or sinister kinde of wisdom, he dealt as a craftie master, with a restless working diligence. This indeede neither proued his sufficiency, nor commended his honestie; since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheless, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weake and busie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Countrey. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Holmilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessalie; Archo, Lycomas, and other good Patriotes among the Achaens, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Achaens should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leuiued; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadours vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclaea; where finding the time conuenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein foueuer it should bee commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but said, that he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achaens, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labyrinthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achaens be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; musing and vnable to resolve whether it were for loue to the Achaens, that the Consul was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Council: touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as hee was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleging that he had no need: In this case therefore, hee had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Romane Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate; the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Achaens were fauours, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kinde, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerthrow all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius; but coming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that hee refused to leaue behinde him certaine horse of the Gallagreekes, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued; that Eumenes gaue a willing eare to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that conuolushe drew him on, in the course, wherinto indignation first led him. How foueuer it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertilements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betwene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, affailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Heerewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with himin Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, that the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to forcele from their war vpon Macedon, or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht: and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer, he began to offer a bargaïne of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, then Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, That if he might haue fiftene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes onely. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samos: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that he in the Temple at Samos had received the money. The Isle of Samos was Perseus his owne: the peace was fully concluded & ratified. The Isle of Samos was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deferred somewhat, howsoeuer the businesse might be speeded: so that needs he would haue part of his wages in present. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, vnder one Clon- dubius, their King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were

were (as Plutarch hath it) the Basitarna. Thefe had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive preſent-pay at the firſt. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perſeus ſent one to them; deſiring their Captaines to come viſit him, whom he promiſed to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the firſt queſtion that their General asked, was, Whether the King had ſent money to give the ſouldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Heereto the meſſenger had not what to anſwer. Why then (ſaid Clondicus) tell thy maſter, That the Gauls will not ſtirre one foote further, untill they have gold, as was agreed, and hoſtages. Perſeus heereupon tooke counſaile: it to vter his owne opinion, before men ſo wife that they would not contradict him, were to take counſaile. He made an inſinuation againſt the incivillitie and avarice of the Basitarna: who came with ſuch numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Few thouſand horſe of them, hee ſaid would bee as manie as he ſhould need to ſee; and not ſo manie, that hee ſhould need to feare them. It had bene well done, if any of his counſailors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, ſince without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrabia, into Thiſſalie: where waſting the Country, and filling themſelves with ſpoile, they ſhould nake the Romans glad to forſake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable ſervice, whether they wonne any victorie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might have bene alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In concluſion, Antigonus, the ſame meſſenger that had bene with them before, was ſent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand; vpon which followed a great murmur of thoſe many thouſands that had bene drawne ſo farre to no purpoſe. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay thoſe few thouſand, whom the King would entertaine. Heerto, when it was perceived, that Antigonus could make no better anſwere, than ſhifting excoles; the Basitarna returned preſently towards Dannubius, waſting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet ſuffering this craftie meſſenger to eſcape unhurt: which was more than hee could have well expected.

30 Thus dealt Perfens, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preferue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painfull Office he was very soone discharged by L. Amilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteene dayes after his setting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a King to foolish and so cowardly.

mirall, and is sent prisoner to Æmilius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romaines hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so moved them, that either "they decreed that Province to L. Amphilus Paulus, Plutarch in vi. A. mil. without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betwene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. He refused to propound vnto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province: vntill by his Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Romane forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowento be such, as hath beene already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Nauie; and likewise to the Armie that lay betwene Illyria and Ephrus: from which App. Claudius was remooued, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Amphilus, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that did thinke themselves wif enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by hearefay, and censure by idle reports: for hee tooke them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Amilius, who died valiantly in the Battaille of Carna. He might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Amilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney; with an especial hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more then 10 could haue beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set sayle at break of day, and arriued safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth night he set forward to the Campe; and was there in fife dayes more. So are there but fife of the nineteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus ly strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was forable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling 20 them to make attempt vpon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were ten miles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shore and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amilius of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Amilius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare, where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not about the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the riuier of Peneus; where hee had watered at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet w^{as} the Romane Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonians, 30 as it presently did; the passage onward being defended as hath bene already shewed, so as it seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquire was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius eyther had not bene informed heereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduerture; they fearing left it would prouee such a peece of worke as had bene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first coming, many disorders in the Romane Campe: 40 teaching the souldiers among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had bene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about fife thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Amelianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darkenesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and 50 Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleet; where victualls were provided for their iourney: it being noyted, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waite the Country. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his mine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-well-neare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Amilius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had aduantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Tower which Perseus had rayled on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Amilius persifted as hee had begunne; and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to reach the Macedonians, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Amilius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were some- 10 what costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully down the Mountaine, brought word into the Camp, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed then any of the rest. Order was forthwith giuento dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their iourney. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came somewhat neere to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrows and slings could doe little seruice, were beaten at hande-strokes: so as the differ- 20 ent relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, Seian Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue bene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunitie.

Perseus was in an extream doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing ben taught by the last yeeres example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But faire worse counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolved to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into any one Towne, lest that should be first of all besieged; and hee therein 30 (as cowardly natures alwaies are iealous) not ouer-carefully relied. This was euen the same that Amilius, or any invader, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neere vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There hee abode the coming of the enemy, who layed not long behinde him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had hastened away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Amilius told 40 him, That he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonians, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out & entrenched behinde the Armie, whereinto, at good leisure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, hee excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy, who aduanced no further, but kept vp- 50 on ground seruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere bene Praetor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to bee the same night: willing the souldiers not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse and Bassons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone

great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted; rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not heere stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in ciuill affaires, and matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the vnderstanding of the wisest, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Amilius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor about the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any deuout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deliuerie, as soone as the thone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senator, and one of the Councell for Warre, w^{ch} partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entales of the beasts. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Amilius; but with condition, That hee should not giue the onlie Hercules w. s. a Greece, and pattail, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonians than the Romane. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Cite, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Dautie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore w^{ld} haue limited his fauour, with no inuincions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Amilius was thoroughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his Pyllare forced to retyre whether hee listid, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haste. Neyther was it to be neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would bee much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Amilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likely hood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which where: neither of the Generalls had ouer-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering: which two or three of the Romane souldiers followed into the ruer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horse out to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His Countreimen seeing this, halted to reuenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the ruer. Heereupon company came in, and helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised heere and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the present condition could bountifullly afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruail, that hee durst aduenture battaille, since hee had be thought himselfe of such a stratagema, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose vnreasonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocritic. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Blow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground: When therefore the King returned to the battaille, hee found it no better than lost; and he, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as wee find recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse on wards, and beat off all which came before it, as Amilius was therat much astonished; That the Pelagii rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them slaine; and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduers to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoire, the victorie might haue bene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaille, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost the impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilest some of the Romans small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it, it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worke) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This comming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction giuen by Amilius, when hee saw the front of the Enemies great battaille become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against many small squadrons, as it had bene formerly in the battaille of Cynoscephala; yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnseruiceable against the other, by reason, that being not euery where alike distressed, it would breake off it selfe; though heere were little such incommenience of ground, as had bene at * Cynoscephala.

Perseus, when hee saw his battaille begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemie: who slew about twenty thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaille, onely some fourescore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foote, escaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: euery one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For hee fell to deuising vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; hee found his Pages and household seruants, ready to attend him, as they had bene wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaille, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnreasonable admonitions, he stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief: he stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends hee had with him only Euander (who had bin employed to kill Emmenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about 500. Cretians; more for loue of his money than of him. To these hee gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though shortly hee coozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaille hee came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Townes-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue written. But the Amphipolitians made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves.

of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdome betweene them, whilst he was a childe. But they found such other businesse, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Calasyria, Phenice, and Iudea, in which he had won by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee liued in the greater securitie. He left behinde him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her bretheren, and after his death to the younger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdome, his younger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vnckle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vp-on him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all means possible to possess himselfe of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnesibemus Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perfwade the Governours of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongst the coast of Syria to Ioppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iafon the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) he was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Calasyria and Phenicia, was disappointed of his awicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angell of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example, to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iafon, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threecore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So he got his desire, though he not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iafon, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kinde, cald to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achaens, when as that mischieuous Callicrates, who had bene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolves does bite more sore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does flye.
So one most mischieuous of men before,
Callicrates, false knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iafon: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iafon thereupon being forced to flye from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty armie of land-forces, He went about to raigne ouer Egypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entered Egypt with a mighty company with, Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Naue, and moued warre against Ptolemæus King of Egypt; but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, so many were wounded to death.

He won many strong Cities and tooke away the spoyle of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled
Gen.

Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Prouinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuerindeede had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelusi and the hill Cassius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had misten Egypt, he turned againe, and went vp towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Poring Vessels, and the Bannes, and the golden Basons, and the Vase and the Crowne, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Siluer and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when hee had taken away all, hee departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Calasyria, iustifying his title by the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffly auring, that this Prouince had not bene consigned ouer to the Egyptians, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achaens, Rhodiens, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by severall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers confirme themselves with intestine war; then by the terror of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weake estate, the younger almost ruinated by his inuasion, the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weake sooner these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him awhile at Antioch; and then made a iourney vnto Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iafon out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof hee presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Solymus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iafon) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reproofed him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten milles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweete Springs, banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to so lust and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discusse. Onely I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearefull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore olde man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when hee came to Onias, hee counselled him crasily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him so come out of the Sanctuary; so he slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness. when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, He tooke away Andronicus his garments of purple, and vnto his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the Citie, and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Onias, he was slaine as a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemie, a Traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, hee condemn'd innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Menelaw, and his brother Zysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of iustice: since he reueng'd the death of Onias, yet slue those that were to in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should haue bene heard as innocent. By reason of such his vnsteadinesse, this King was commonly teamed Epimanes; that is, mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there scene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, forty daies long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spacemen, and as troupes of Horsemen set in aray, en-countings of God, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starr in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens dining.

When Linia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Linia cauld not this Hen to be carefully nurished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire encroafe of white Poultry; and from the little Branch there sprang vp intime a Grove of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vse to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, so foretew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be vnwor-thy of regard; it appears by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphus, nor strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physon had not yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexan- drines though they loued not Philemetor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Courtre; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philemetor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Egypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne

owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly entaged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philemetor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answer to all Embassadors, yet he now prepar'd to make a sharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end hee presently furnished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Calasrya, ready to enter Egypt the 10 Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Em-bassadors sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yelde thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philemetor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather be pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto be-20 longing: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answer vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine; and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphus, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie iour-neyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iust cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it 30 would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuerthelesse, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing iointly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable be-nefices should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achaens attained. And by the like 40 helpe, had Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of suitable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhadians and Achaens, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Achaens they desired in particular, that Lycortas the braue Warriour might be sent vnto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hercunto the Achaens readily condescended: and would immediately haue made performance, if Callicrates had not interposed his mischievous art. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his ob-sequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but withall their power, be ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yelde vnto the 50 Romans, what helpe soeuer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obtinably perswaded, terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Marius Zzzzz 2 the

the late Confull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well be spared, to the ayde of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Achaens could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; he brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Marius; whereby the Achaens were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadours to set Egypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeede sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achaens should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybus and his friends, durst not gaine-say the Roman Council; which had force of an iniunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassadour sent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had bene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadours of Physcon and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadours deliuered their message in the name of him that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philonor, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

In this ambassage of Ptoleme, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had bene before three or foure yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eulaus, or Teneus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely hee determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Celestria; but would haue interposed himselfe betwene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it should wth that 30 his Embassadour was by a friend perwaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subjects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subjects, he might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister, shewed itselfe, even in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heads and beardes overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groueling and prostrate 40 vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their looks and Countenances so sadde and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Country stood, they made a pittifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much hetherfore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederate; then would hee presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Egypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vsed any delay; then should Ptoleme and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make reparaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours to determine and end the warre betwene those Kings. In commission they had first to finde King Ptoleme, and then Antiochus, and 10 to let them both vnderstand, that whelke they pleased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leave, and went on ward their way within three dayes after.

Whilist Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius; but Popilius filled it with a Rolle of papers, willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which hee held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawsed awhile, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling very particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Ierusalem after his returne; likewise if these things had rather bene historified then fore told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed awhile, and sealed the Kingdome of Egypt, leauing it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the yonger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had bene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian ships.

§. XIII.

How the Romans were dreadsfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Misastis, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the warre.

BY this pre-emptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse 40 of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Achaens and Aetolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed any menacing termes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallagrecques, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopeful promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaimed by the faithfull counsaile of Stra-tius a Physician, whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vp-right. So, when hee came into the Senate, he deliuered the errand about which hee had bene sent, recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, where withall hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Enus and Maronea might be bestowed subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes; not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happye that Countreie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That * God is the first and sharpest Schoolmaster that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controule to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus, it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintus Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver¹⁰ carried by Paulus into the Roman treasure, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuill Wars which followed vpon the death of Iulius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindred by the souldi-¹⁵ors; who grudged at their General, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by seuerall exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died five daies before the Triumph; the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperi-²⁰tie; since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Octavianus the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Sarmathrace; and Anicinus the Prator, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their fearefull triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to lay vnto Rome, Sonne superfluous, Take vpon thee the Maieslie, that thy deserts haue pur-³⁰chased.

BY this which wee haue already set downe, is seene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. Wee haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off; her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the subject of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preferred, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragickall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Infallibilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue beene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule; which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which yo were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, vnder-⁴⁰stood by them which are dissolued; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stolne out of the world without noyse; than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie: by giuing in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath bene no State fearefull in the East, but that of

of the Turk; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expell'd the Moors out of Granada, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoysed by the Per-¹⁰sian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue bene spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defenseless Warre, and in diuisions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the most, they may not onely be perswaded to liue in peace, but all their sweet-¹⁵ling and ouer-flowing streames may bee brought backe into their naturall channells and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof: the one to ioyn all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bene already said; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they finde the experi-²⁰ence in themselves. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which God with all his words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroy-²⁵eth man, is beleueed; God, which hath made him and loues him, is alwaies deferred. I haue considered (saith Salomon) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of spirit; but who beleeues it, till Death tells it vs. It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fifth, made him enioyne his sonne Phillip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that iustice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then³⁰ he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiecks, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happi-³⁵nesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rotten-⁴⁰nesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust, and mighty Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou on-⁴⁵ly hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the faire stre-ched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it selfe, The first part of the Gene-⁵⁰ral Histories of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspokeable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught mee to say with Iob, Perfeci in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem fletum.

FINIS.

To the Reader.

The use of Chronological Tables is needfull to all Historians, that reach to anie length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annales, yearly set downe all Occurrences not co-vemt. This heere following, may serve as an Index to the present Part of this worke; pointing unto the severall matters, that having fallen out at one time, are sette distined in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that anie can be, For how-soever the yeares of the first Patriarchs may seeme to have been well-neere compleat, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, we finde many fractions, and the least yeere, or yeeres, of one King reckoned also as the most of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in manye other; though not precisely recorded. Heere to may be added the diverse and imperfect formes of the yee, which were in use among sundry Nations: causing the * Summer Months, in prosse of some ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the receiving of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse out of so many, and utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten authoritie, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such rrair as a more intente and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde heerein. It miserieue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from any notorious Anachronisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, even in that regard; not onely for some errors of the presse, in the numbring of yeeres, but for some haste mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to have heereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles over the Columnes, have reference to that which followes under them; as will readily be conceived. Where to Titles, or more, are over the head, as Rome, there doe the numbers underneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Iehosaphat beganne his reigne in the 3774. of the Julian Aera, in the 3092. of the World, & in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, so those that are acquainted with works of this kinde, To avoid prolixitie, I have forborne to insert these yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reigne; some change of Gouvernement; some Bastaine fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeeres wherein Syllius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betwene the 4. of Iehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Syllius Auentinus succeeded, and wherein Iehoram first reigned with Iehosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to have filled up a page with 12 lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Auentinus, and the 17. of Iehosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth; in ranke, of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeere of his reigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath are those yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkable accident.

Pandion chiefdom of the Kingdom, which is recovered by his one hegemon, in few years after. The omission of this Interreg- num, and retaining the years in the forty eight of Aegaeus as the working them apart by themselves, levels and answers the difference in the times of the Athenians following - as of Anacletus, Ca- reus, and the rest.
